"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 565) for the relief of Rev. Worcester Willey, make the following report:

"It appears by the evidence in this case that the American board of missions commenced their labors among the Cherokees as early as 1817. After the removal of the Cherokees to the Indian Territory the said board established a mission at Dwight Station, in the Cherokee country; that at different times thereafter they established missions at Park Hill, Fairfield, and Lee's Creek, in the said Cherokee country; that at the time the said board commenced missionary labors among the Cherokees it was promised by the Government that the board and their missionary laborers should be protected in their persons and property by the Government; that for years prior to 1864 the mission stations were under the general management of the Rev. Worcester Willey; that they had in use and had accumulated in connection with these various missions a large amount of property; that on or about the 3d day of December, 1863, the said American board sold and conveyed to the said Rev. Worcester Willey all the property at Dwight Station to his sole use and benefit; that the balance of the property belonging to the board at Park Hill, Fairfield, and Lee's Creek remained the property of the said board; that the work of the mission had been carried on at all the mission stations under the direction of the said Willey until in the year 1864; that in that year the property belonging to the said Willey, to the American board, and to Esther Smith, a teacher, was taken and for the most part used by the United States forces under the orders of the officers of the various commands; that the value of the property taken as claimed, and as shown by schedules annexed to the testimony, belonging to the Rev. Worcester Willey was $15,611.60; to the American board, $5,516.75, and to Esther Smith, $749.40; that no part of the property so taken was ever recovered by any of the said owners.

"That the thirtieth article of the treaty of July 19, 1866, provided that 'the United States agree to pay to the proper claimants all losses of property by missionaries or missionary societies from their being ordered or driven from the country by United States agents, and from their property being taken and occupied or destroyed by the United States troops, not exceeding in the aggregate $20,000, to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior;' that the act of March 2, 1867, appropriated 'for the payment of losses of property by missionaries or missionary societies, on account of the troops and agents of the United States, treaty July 19, 1866, thirtieth article, $20,000;' that there had been in the said Cherokee country missionaries and missionary stations of several other religious denominations than that of the American board; that soon after the said appropriation claims were presented for payment to the Secretary of the Interior by the said Willey for himself, and by the said Esther Smith and the said American board; that claims were also presented by the American Baptist Missionary Union by J. B. and Evan Jones, their missionaries, and by the Moravian board, by G. Bishop and E. J. Mack, their missionaries, and perhaps others; that by some mistake or misapprehension neither the said Willey nor Esther Smith nor the said American board have ever received any portion of the said

$20,000; that the Secretary of the Interior allowed and paid the following sums out of the $20,000 appropriated under the treaty, to wit:

To the American Baptist Missionary Union	$13,060 00
To Rev. J. B. Jones	1,221 00
To Evan Jones	818 00
To the Moravian board	3,279 69
To Rev. G. Bishop	377 63
To Rev. E. J. Mack	1,243 68

"And that he has paid the whole of the said sum, as above stated.

"Your committee find that the personal property belonging to the said Willey and the American board consisted of cattle, hogs, and crops to a considerable amount in value, and from the statements made by John M. Taylor of the Second Kansas Cavalry, Colonel Williams of the First Kansas Infantry, General John M. Thayer, Col. William A. Phillips, and Lieutenant-Colonel Hoyt, that they and their commands were encamped near Dwight Station; that they were compelled to subsist on the country, and that cattle were taken from said Dwight Station and the other stations above named and used for food for their commands by their orders, and that a large amount of other property found there, consisting of crops, household property, and family stores, were also taken and used.

"It further appears from the testimony of the claimant that he had knowledge that a very large proportion of the property belonging to him at the said Dwight Station, to the said American board at the other stations, and to the said Esther Smith, was taken by the direction of the officers of the military forces and used for supplies.

"The claimants ask to be allowed their respective claims—

"(1) Because they were promised protection in their persons and property by the Government.

"(2) That the purpose of the treaty was to give this indemnity to all the missionaries and missionary societies who had been sufferers in the Cherokee country, but that the amount stipulated and appropriated proved inadequate.

"(3) That the claimants in justice ought not to be the only sufferers.

"(4) That aside from this the claimants were loyal citizens whose property has been taken by the order of Federal officers and used for military and commissary stores.

"The committee are of the opinion that the claim is a just one, but that the value of the property, as recited in the schedules annexed to the testimony, is too high, and they recommend that $10,000 be allowed Worcester Willey, that $500 be allowed Esther Smith, and that $2,000 be allowed the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in full of their respective claims.

"The committee therefore report a bill for that purpose and recommend its passage; and they further recommend that the bill committed to them be indefinitely postponed."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Claims why this claim was not presented to the Southern Claims Commission?

Mr. PIKE. I am not very well informed about the condition of things under that law. This occurred in the Cherokee country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It opens everything.

Mr. LOGAN. I have known a great may claims pass through here that did not seem to me to be exactly the thing. If we are going to pass them in this loose manner, we might as well open the doors and pass them all. This report does not show the name of an officer who took this property; it does not show any cause for taking it; it does not show anything that is necessary according to the rules established during the war which would entitle these parties to one cent. It does not show that the property was within the part of the Cherokee Nation that was not in rebellion against the Government, or anything that would be necessary in order to give compensation. We know very well that the Cherokee Nation was in open revolt against the Government. The troops were sent there.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Illinois will pardon me for calling his attention to this statement in the report:

From the statements made by John M. Taylor, of the Second Kansas Cavalry, Colonel Williams, of the First Kansas Infantry, General John M. Thayer, Col. William A. Phillips, and Lieutenant-Colonel Hoyt, that they and their commands were encamped near Dwight Station; that they were compelled to subsist on the country, and that cattle were taken from said Dwight Station and the other stations above-named.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly; "encamped near Dwight's Station;" but it does not show what troops or under what orders. It may have been done by Indians; it may have been done by parties not connected with the Army at all, and even if they were connected with the Army that would not justify payment unless the property was taken under the law when that country was in rebellion.

I must confess that the character of reports which have been made here for some time about claims is astonishing. There is no law to justify a payment of this kind unless the report shows that the taking has been brought within the law that applies in a state of war. No such thing is shown here, so far as I see.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, another very notable feature about this matter is found in the second paragraph of the report of the Committee on Claims, No. 683, made to the Forty-eighth Congress, first session, which recites:

That the thirtieth article of the treaty of July 19, 1866, provided that "the United States agree to pay to the proper claimants all losses of property by missionaries or missionary societies from their being ordered or driven from the country by United States agents, and from their property being taken and occupied or destroyed by the United States troops, not exceeding in the aggregate $20,000, to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior."

It subsequently appears—

That the act of March 2, 1867—

Nine or ten months after the treaty—

appropriated "for the payment of losses of property by missionaries or missionary societies, on account of the troops and agents of the United States, treaty July 19, 1866, thirtieth article, $20,000."

So that under that treaty the Government proceeded to ascertain what damages had accrued, and paid for them. The report goes on to say:

That there had been in the said Cherokee country missionaries and missionary stations of several other religious denominations than that of the American board; that soon after the said appropriation claims were presented for payment to the Secretary of the Interior by the said Willey for himself, and by the said Esther Smith and the said American board; that claims were also presented by the American Baptist Missionary Union by J. B. and Evan Jones, their missionaries, and by the Moravian board, by G. Bishop and E. J. Mack, their missionaries, and perhaps others.

Now this is the singular statement:

That by some mistake or misapprehension neither the said Willey nor Esther Smith nor the said American board have ever received any portion of the said $20,000.

That is, after the provisions of the treaty had been fully executed by the Government, after the amounts that were to be paid had been ascertained and the sums appropriated by Congress, these parties then came in and set up their damages which had been agreed to by the Secretary of the Interior, and by some mistake or misapprehension on the part of these persons who had had their day in court and been paid so far as the Government could pay them, they failed to get the money to which they were entitled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will pause; it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that that bill be informally laid aside to allow the Committee on Appropriations to go on with the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the Post-Office appropriation bill be continued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order is made. The Chair will take this occasion to present a message from the President of the United States.

PORT OF OMAHA—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith return without my approval Senate bill No. 141, entitled "An act to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled 'An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes,' to the port of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska."

The statute which was passed June 10, 1880, referred to in the title of this bill, permitted certain merchandise imported at specified ports, but which was consigned to certain other ports which were mentioned by name in the seventh section of said act, to be shipped immediately after entry at the port of arrival to such destination.

The seventh section of said act contained the names of more than seventy ports or places to which imported merchandise might be thus immediately shipped. One of the places thus named is "Omaha, in Nebraska."

But it was declared in a proviso which was made a part of this section that the privilege of immediate transportation contemplated by the act should "not extend to any place at which there are not the necessary officers for the appraisement of merchandise and the collection of duties."

Because there were no such officers at Omaha the privilege mentioned was withheld from that place by the Treasury Department.

The bill submitted to me for approval provides that these privileges conferred by the act of June 10, 1880, be "extended to the port of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, as provided for as to the ports mentioned in section 7 of said act."

I can not see that anything is gained by this legislation.

If the circumstances should warrant such a course, the authority which withholds such privileges from any of the places mentioned in the law of 1880 can confer the same without the aid of a new statute. This position is sustained by an opinion of the Attorney-General, dated in February, 1885.

If the legislation now proposed should become operative the privileges extended to the city of Omaha would still be subject to the proviso attached to the seventh section of the law of 1880; and such newly-granted privileges would be liable to immediate withdrawal by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Thus, if the design of this bill is to restore to the city named the privileges permitted by the law of 1880, it seems to be entirely unnecessary—since the power of such restoration is now fully vested in the Treasury Department. If the object sought is to bestow such privileges entirely free from the operation of the proviso above recited, the language of the bill does not accomplish that result.

I understand that the Government has not now at Omaha "the necessary officers for the appraisement of merchandise and the collection of duties," which by such proviso are necessary in order to secure to any place the advantages of immediate transportation. In the absence of such officers the proposed legislation would be nugatory and inoperative.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 30, 1886.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

Mr. ALLISON. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., was passed this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAY in the chair). The motion will be entered. The Chair lays before the Senate the regular order, being the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. HOAR. I appeal to the Senator from Kansas to let us go on and finish the motion to reconsider the Montgomery case. Let us settle it. The Senator from New Hampshire has made a report in that case; the Senate agreed, to enable him to go home on account of ill health, that they would consider the cases reported by him at a particular time. The report was read, nobody objected, and the case passed. Now it seems to me, as to the Montgomery case, if any Senator had demanded an explanation, he could have had it. It is not fair to enter a motion to reconsider after it has passed. I think if the Senator from Maine who is entitled to the floor will yield——

Mr. HALE. I am willing to take the sense of the Senate about that.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the motion to reconsider the Montgomery case.

Mr. INGALLS. Does that require unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has the floor on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I know nothing about the case, but it does seem one that will give rise to debate; and in the absence of the Senator from Kansas who is managing the Post-Office appropriation bill, and who expects to go on with it with the hope that he may finish it to-night, I shall not consent to yield.

Mr. HOAR. Pardon me one moment. The bill about the American Missionary Association I know nothing about; I do not think I was present in committee when it was considered; but the Pearson C. Montgomery case I do know something about, and there are in that report certain objections and counter-claims, so that a person hastily reading it might suppose that those objections were overruled by the committee. The committee steered clear of all that by denying all the portion of the claim to which they could possibly relate. We give the man whose steamboat was sent out of the country and brought in use by the United States at the request of the authorities pay only after it was ordered to be restored till it was surrendered to him. It was given back to him, and the time after it was ordered to be given back by the decision of the court is all the committee have allowed him, as I understand. Let us have the sense of the Senate on that.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I ought to say one word as I made the motion to reconsider. My attention was not called to the bill until after it had passed from the consideration of the Senate. Then I read the report of which the Senator from Massachusetts speaks, and I find many things in it that require consideration. I find it pretty well ear-marked by somebody, and it seemed to me that it was a case which justified the Senate in making an examination of it and requiring of the committee who made the report an explanation of the circumstances.

Mr. HOAR. Now, if my friend will pardon me, that is right. It ought to be explained; it ought to be understood by every Senator. It ought to be examined as much as it deserves. It was reached on the Calendar weeks ago; the report was read; then on the objection of a single Senator, under the rule, it passed over. Then it came up again, in the first place, on the request of the Senator from New Hampshire made a few days ago that the cases which he had reported should be taken up at this time. It was reached again, and then passed by the Senate, the report being read.

Now, my appeal is not on the merits of the bill. It is that it is not fair that it should not be disposed of by the Senate at this time, and I wish to say in one word that in my judgment there is no greater exhibition of human injustice in the conduct of any government that I know of on the face of the earth than in the conduct of this Government in regard to the treatment of private claims. I do not refer to my honorable friend from Iowa, to whom the remark does not apply that I am going to make least of all men in the world; but it does seem to me as if there had been and were men in public life who thought they could get a cheap reputation for honesty and for being watch-dogs of the Treasury by interposing objection to every claim, whatever its merits.

There are men who come here year after year, and women, widows and orphans, who live and die with claims as good against this Government as the claim of the holder of a Government bond; and they are put off day after day and Congress after Congress by the Senate never finding time when it can take them up and consider them. I say that it is my duty as a Senator, when a man comes to the Government of the United States and says that Government owes him five or ten thousand dollars to look into it and not to be afraid to pay it and deal with it fairly.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, when the debate rested last evening I was referring to the commerce of Spanish and Portuguese America and was proceeding to give some figures bringing out more in detail the facts touching that commerce.

Mr. PIKE. I appeal to the Senator from Maine to yield to see whether the Senate will dispose of the motion to reconsider the Montgomery case.

Mr. HALE. I am in the hands of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who has charge of the appropriation bill. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not know how long it will take to do what he wishes.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, under the rules the motion to reconsider is not debatable, and I suppose we can come to a vote at once if the Senator will kindly yield.

Mr. HALE. I leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. This appropriation bill has so far got along that I think it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. PIKE. I ask that unanimous consent——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HARRIS. What does the Senator ask to take up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of what bill?

Mr. PIKE. The American missionary and Worcester Willey bill.

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 225, being the bill (S. 472) for the relief of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Rev. Worcester Willey, and Esther Smith.

Mr. HALE. That is the bill the Senate was considering when 2 o'clock came.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read shall be resumed. Is there objection?

Mr. PLUMB. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of the bill whose title has just been read. Is there objection?

Mr. PLUMB. I shall object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill can not be considered now.

Mr. PLUMB. If there could be any chance of these bills being disposed of within some reasonable period of time I should not interpose an objection, but if the whole day is to be consumed, as I see it will be under the way it is now going, I feel as though it is my duty to insist on the Post-Office appropriation bill going on. I have no objection to taking up the bill if that be the only bill, or I have no objection to allowing a reasonable space of time to the Committee on Claims if they will settle what time they want, but we ought to get through the appropriation bill this afternoon.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Hampshire only asks for one bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 472) for the relief of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Rev. Worcester Willey, and Esther Smith.

Mr. PIKE. In answer to the objection of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that this would be unprecedented without there being any military officers' names who ordered the taking of the supplies, I ask him to examine the report, and he will find that the explanation is there. I will read it:

> Your committee find that the personal property belonging to the said Willey and the American board consisted of cattle, hogs, and crops to a considerable amount in value, and from the statements made by John M. Taylor of the Second Kansas Cavalry, Colonel Williams of the First Kansas Infantry, General John M. Thayer, Col. William A. Phillips, and Lieutenant-Colonel Hoyt, that they and their commands were encamped near Dwight Station, that they were compelled to subsist on the country, and that cattle were taken from said Dwight Station and the other stations above named and used for food for their commands by their orders, and that a large amount of other property found there, consisting of crops, household property, and family stores, were also taken and used.

That is as specific as it could be that this property for which claim is made here was, as the committee found, taken by order of United States officers and used for the benefit of the Army.

The idea that the American board of missions, that has been out there civilizing and Christianizing the Indians, should not receive compensation for their property taken and used by the United States is absurd. A treaty was made by which $20,000 was appropriated to pay these missionaries and others of other denominations. It does not appear that Mr. Willey and the American board, or this school teacher, Esther Smith, was any party to it or agreed to it. The $20,000 was paid, but the $20,000 was paid to others and they got nothing. Their property was all taken, and a very large amount of it was used for the benefit of the United States Army, and they ask to be paid for it. That is the whole case.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know that I need say anything, but I knew this Mr. Willey. He was born in the same town where I was born. He is now an old man, very nearly eighty years, over seventy at least. He is one of a family of six brothers who were clergymen, and he himself, like the others, is one of the very best men I have ever known. He has given his whole life to the service of God and of humanity. After having been a missionary among the Cherokees for about twenty years in charge of the missions of the American board there, he had accumulated a small property, the war came on, and the property was taken by the command of the Government and appropriated and used for the sustenance, maintenance, and accommodation of the Army. The man was left so destitute that some part of the same year he was obliged to live in a den in the earth. He has been a very poor man ever since. He continued his missionary and clerical labors until recently, and now he is in abject poverty. He has nothing, only what he may get from the Government for this just claim, for his maintenance in his old age.

There was a list of like cases. An appropriation was formerly made which covered a portion of them—I mean cases of missionary and other organizations—and the entire fund was exhausted before reaching this case of Mr. Willey, which is precisely of the same nature, and if any of them ought to have been paid surely this ought to be.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the regular order be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be pursued unless objection be made.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, under the head of "Office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails," after line 99, section 1, to insert:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

Mr. HALE. Two things, Mr. President, are noticeable whenever any person begins to investigate this subject of the commerce of Spanish and Portuguese America: first its magnitude, and second the small proportion of it which we control. The total annual commerce of Central and South America amounts to the great sum of $850,000,000. The merchandise and products imported into those states from other countries amount to $420,000,000 annually. Of this large sum the United States, their near neighbor, their sister Republic, no ocean lying between them, with similarity of institutions, and with a desire on the part of these nations for continued acquaintance and for more extensive mercantile and commercial relations, only furnishes $40,000,000, or about 10 per cent.

Mr. INGALLS. What are the principal articles?

Mr. HALE. I will come to that in a moment. We take, on the other hand, and pay for, from these countries $90,000,000 per year of their products; and the tables, which have been carefully prepared by the commission, show that in the twenty years between 1865 and 1884, inclusive, the total exports from the United States into these countries amounted to $442,048,975, while the imports into the United States from these countries, for which we paid, amounted in the same time to $1,185,828,579, or an excess of imports or a balance of trade against us of $765,992,219.

Mr. BUTLER. In what length of time?

Mr. HALE. Twenty years up to 1884. We were sending to them railway iron, machinery, farming implements, cotton and woolen goods, provisions, canned meats, flour, boots and shoes, sewing-machines, petroleum, and many other articles which I do not name because the amount of each was small. We take from them and pay this enormous sum, leaving this immense balance of trade against us in the twenty years of nearly $800,000,000, coffee, hides, rubber, wool, sugar, dye-woods, fruits, and other less important articles.

Now, Mr. President, that is not a pleasant thing to contemplate. This immense commerce lying at our door has drifted into European hands, and until now little or no attempt has been made to arrest that drift. It is not a pleasing thing to take up in detail the countries lying south of us and see how it is that even where we had trade it has gone from us and has fallen into European hands. Take the Central American trade, the states lying between Mexico and the Isthmus. Between 1863 and 1882, twenty years, the United States exported into the states of Central America $20,880,010 worth, and imported and paid for from them, $47,025,287, or a balance against us of $26,145,277. We take from them rubber, hides, drugs, fruits, and some sugar and cocoa.

Take the Argentine Republic, and this is an interesting people. It has a commerce that has a steady and rapid growth, increasing more largely proportionately than that of any other South American state, with perhaps the exception of Chili. It is a nation with great resources in itself. The people there are full of enterprise. They are already under contract for building in the near future $60,000,000 worth of new railways, and in the twenty years between 1865 and 1884, inclusive, the United States only exported into that country $40,000,000 in round numbers. Great Britain in the same time exported $251,000,000 and odd, and France $313,000,000, while the balance of trade was against us during these years to the extent that our exports of $46,819,836 were set against our imports of $109,751,946, showing a balance against us of over $62,000,000, and in the last year the harbors of this country and of the region around the mouth of the La Plata were not visited by a single American steam-vessel and only by a few sailing craft.

Mr. FRYE. Can you give the number of English, French, and German vessels that went there?

Mr. HALE. "Twenty-one lines of steamships, sailing from forty-five to sixty vessels a month, between Buenos Ayres and the ports of Europe. We have no steamship communication with the Argentine Republic whatever. During ths last year, out of the immense shipping represented in the harbor of that metropolis, there were no steamers from the United States."

Take the case of Brazil, the greatest of the South American countries. The balance of trade against us in twenty years, between 1865 and 1884, inclusive, in our commerce with Brazil is $580,000,000. We have furnished to them of our products and in return have taken from them theirs and have paid them more than we have given to them—$580,000,000. That is the balance of trade against us in twenty years.

The average value of merchandise imported from all countries into Brazil is about $140,000,000 annually, and of this the United States only furnishes about $8,000,000. Great Britain furnishes 45 per cent. of the whole, more than $60,000,000; France, about 17 per cent.

Here are some of the lists of articles which show this great balance against us.

The United States furnished to Brazil in the year 1883 of the article of coal $2,823 worth, and Great Britain during that same year furnished to the Brazilians $1,020,480 worth. With all our immense supplies of this article, with which we could furnish the fuel for the world for centuries, we only furnished to Brazil in that year a little more than $2,000 against over a million by Great Britain.

In cotton goods we furnished $612,828, while Great Britain furnished $15,778,098. Of manufactures of flax we furnished $49,019; Great Britain, $1,446,572. Of iron and steel manufactures $1,034,648 were furnished by the United States against $5,674,407 by Great Britain; of manufactures of leather, $36,248 for us, and $990,383 for Great Britain; of wearing apparel, $17,172 for the United States, and $367,346 for Great Britain; of woolen goods, $2,842 sold by us to the Brazilians, and $1,618,310 by Great Britain.

France in that same year furnished $1,816,000 worth of leather manufactures to the Brazilians against our $36,000.

Take Chili, which is called the yankee-land of South America, whose people are bright, enterprising, brave, warlike, whose trade and commerce is largely increasing from year to year. From 1863 to 1882, inclusive, the United States furnished in round numbers of the imports into Chili about $40,000,000, while Great Britain furnished in round numbers about $160,000,000, and France about as much as Great Britain.

I might go on, but I do not wish to weary the Senate with the statistics of other countries. They all tell the same story. Bolivia in the last year does not appear in our returns as having had any commerce with the United States. Everything has dropped out, and yet she has a large trade. Peru, the States of Colombia, Venezuela, and other South American countries tell the same story with Brazil and the Argentine Republic.

Now, Mr. President, all this is with people who are not unfriendly to us. It is with nations whose history is to some degree similar to ours, who revolted from a condition of colonial dependence upon European powers and set up governments of their own, republican institutions, modeling their constitutions largely upon ours and with a natural tendency in our direction, a tendency shown in every possible practical way. The commission say after their investigation, after visiting these countries, and after conferences upon the subject-matter of their mission, the opening and extending of American commerce:

Political, geographical, and commercial considerations all favor an increased trade between the Argentine people and those of the United States; and their desire to seek our markets, instead of being driven to those of Europe, is shown by the fact that, since 1877, an offer of a subsidy had been made by the Argentine Government to any company that will establish direct steamship communication with the United States.

I desire Senators to bear in mind the emphasis that is placed not only here in what I am reading but elsewhere, all through, not only by the commission but by merchants and consuls, and by officials of these governments, upon "direct communication"—steamship communication that is regular, that can be depended upon, that has speed and frequency.

The commission was informed by gentlemen engaged in trade with Central America that the principal obstacle in the way of an increased trade between the United States and those countries is the lack of communication.

In the course of the investigations which the commission made they took the statement of the Brazilian consul-general, Mr. Mendonca, in New York, which is found on pages 62 and 63 of their report. A most interesting interview it was, and he winds up as follows:

Many other things have been brought to my attention, and I hope to send to you some information in writing, giving my general views of the affairs; and I am sure that the Government of Brazil, as my minister has said to you, will receive the commission with great cordiality, and I think you will be able on your return to tell us something in confirmation of the views which I have expressed to-day. The desire of all intelligent Brazilians in that trade between this country and Brazil will be an exchange of products, instead of an exportation of about $45,000,000 a year and an importation of about $90,000,000.

Mr. Thomas R. Lombard, who has been for years engaged in commercial pursuits in Central America and in South America, and for a time a resident there, came before the commission. Speaking about the feeling in Central America, in Honduras especially, he said:

The Americans in Honduras to-day stand better than other people, as far as respect for us is concerned. They have not much respect for our Government, because they say any one of the Spanish governments can whip us with our Navy, but for the Americans, personally, they have a great respect, and everything they can do, the Government or the people individually, they do for us; and I think if the American merchants would send their men in there to seek the trade, and would be willing to give the credits that the English do, they would get the balance of the trade very quickly. All of them want, especially, American cotton goods. They do not like the English; they say there is too much starch in them, and when they wash it out they are all rags instead of good cloth. We do not try to get the trade, and they do not seek us.

Mr. President, with this condition of affairs, with this large and growing commerce near to our doors, with a friendly people or peoples seeking to promote an increased commercial intercourse, the practical question arises—and it is a fair question, it is a question which Senators have asked themselves and have asked me—how do subsidies tend to open new commercial fields? I recognize the force of that inquiry, I recognize the honest skepticism in the minds of Senators and others upon this question, how it is that subsidies to steamship lines will result in the sending of more and more of our products to any country when we subsidize a line. That is a fair question and ought to be met fairly and squarely.

In the first place, as I have already said, it is what has invariably been resorted to by every government seeking to extend its commerce and to furnish new and increased markets for the products of its labor. I know of no exception, I know of no case where any European country has become alarmed by its internal condition and by the effect of overproduction of goods more than its own people can consume, where that European country has looked out to build up a trade, that it has not at once, as a matter of couse, resorted to subsidies, because it has realized what the commission refers to and what is referred to in this investigation everywhere, the necessity for "direct communication," for stated and regular communication, for speedy and frequent communication between the ports where the goods are shipped and the ports where the markets are found.

Instances have been found where, when a trade had so been built up and where the people receiving the products and the goods had learned to rely upon direct and stated and regular communications, the subsidies have been gradually lessened, furnishing in this as in other fields of political economy an instance of a great industry that may be helped and shored up at first, at last becoming self-sustaining. But I know of no instance where the experiment has been tried and where increased trade and commerce and increased markets have been sought that it has not been begun by subsidizing lines of steamers in order to increase the communication between the two countries. This should go for a great deal in proving that we must resort to subsidies.

This subject was considered by this most intelligent commission very carefully, and I shall read some of their conclusions. Speaking of the enormous difference of trade, the balance against us, and of our small exportations, compared with those of European countries, the commission say:

The causes which have produced this enormous difference in trade are evident. The commercial supremacy of England and France in South America was achieved by the same agency that developed our own great West—governmental aid and encouragement.

The illustration is most pat and pertinent, that in these years when the United States has been engaged in building up internal commerce it took the same course that the European countries have taken in building up foreign commerce. Said the commission:

The broad earth-ocean which stretches between the Mississippi Valley and the Pacific slope would have been an insurmountable obstacle to even American enterprise had not this Government by gifts of lands and guarantees of bonds laid a foundation upon which private capital was secure.

By the same means the commerce of the Argentine Confederation and its sister states in South America has been swept into the lap of England and France. At the outset a liberal compensation for transportation was paid in order to encourage regular and rapid steam communication, and it is still kept up by both countries. These steamship lines—also received subsidies from several of the South American governments under restrictions which protected the public but offered a generous profit to their projectors.

In investigating the condition of commerce in Central America, the commission say:

The commission was informed by gentlemen engaged in trade with Central America that the principal obstacle in the way of an increased trade between the United States and those countries is the lack of communication.

France has realized this to a remarkable extent. During the past fifteen years France has paid in the encouragement of steamship lines $70,166,670 in subsidies, and the result has been shown in the growth of her commerce, which began when she began to subsidize and has continued with the continuation of that policy, so that in 1883 it had risen to 667,474 tons. The French Government pays $4,600,000 annually to steamers which carry its mails. It pays $1,714,604 to the Oriental line; $728,000 to the South American line; $950,000 to the Mediterranean line; $790,000 to the Mexican and West Indian line, and $500,000 to the New York one; and yet Senators object to our paying in all $800,000.

Mr. Edward Shippen, the consul at Philadelphia of the Republic of Chili, in a most intelligent interview which he had with the commission in going over this subject said:

I think that the blame for the existing condition of things rests partly with us and partly with the Government. In the present condition of trade it does seem to me that the Government should extend every possible facility toward the encouragement of our commercial relations with South America. We should as the British Government does, as the Belgian, the German, and perhaps some other governments do, subsidize lines of steamers, and thus secure—direct ocean communication, of which we are now destitute.

So much for the uses of subsidies. Now another difficulty is met in the way which ought to be fairly treated, and that is in the proposition that we have no commerce or little commerce with those countries because we can not furnish goods as cheaply as Great Britain and other European countries. That is a subject which was investigated as it should have been by this commission most carefully and exhaustively; because while it is claimed by the Senator from Kentucky and others who agree with him and who are of his school of belief that one great reason why we have no more commerce is that we can not compete with European nations, still there are others of another school of thought who believe that the protective system has so stimulated industry here and has made competition so great that we can furnish better goods, in many cases for the same price, than are produced abroad, with the difference in our favor when American lines are established of cheaper freight, which is a large consideration in this subject, than can be furnished by farther distant European nations.

Let us look at this for a moment and see what the statistics show.

The commission say, speaking of the Argentine Confederation again:

The imports of the Argentine Confederation consist of merchandise which, almost without exception, can be and is produced in this country and sold at figures as low, if not lower, than in Europe.

Speaking of the trade in cotton goods, they say:

The principal import into Central America is cotton goods, which the manufacturers of the United States can furnish in quality and price equal to those now purchased from England. But during the year 1880 England sold Central America 31,476,000 yards of cotton cloth, while the United States sold that country but 688,000 yards. The difference in price was in favor of the United States on printed cottons, the average being 7.14 cents per yard, while the price paid England for the same sort of goods was 7.15 cents per yard. For plain goods England gave a little better figures, the average price being 5.23 cents per yard, while the price in the United States was 6.89 cents per yard.

But the facilities for regular transportation which had been built up by the English system of subsidies, the many lines that furnished the swift steamers that plied between the English ports and the ports of Central America, enabled Great Britain to furnish to the peoples of Central America in that way 31,476,000 yards of cotton cloth, while we, furnishing the same or better goods at less price, only sent them 688,000 yards.

Mr. PLATT. What is the difference in time between the United States and Great Britain to the ports of Central America?

Mr. HALE. I do not know what the difference in time would be, but certainly several days.

Mr. Curtis, one of the commission, in his report upon this very subject, after examining the statistics, said:

The assertion that we can not compete with Manchester prices is absurd. The only reason we are undersold is that we send an honest fabric to compete with a dishonest one; but as long as the English manufacturers send cargoes of pipe-clay and starch to the tropical countries our exporters must furnish the same article or be undersold. There is a grim humor in the fact that the popularity of our cotton goods is so great that nearly every bale of this bogus fabric shipped tha from Manchester to the South American nations bears the coat of arms of the United States and is marked "Best American drillings, Mass., U. S. A"

There is not a commercial city in Spanish America where the manufacturers of the United States can not compete with their European rivals in every article we produce for export.

But, as Mr. Curtis says, so long as we can not afford to maintain lines and the Government refuses to interfere, and it costs $40 in freight per ton, and that at uncertain times and periods to send goods from us while it costs less than $20 per ton by these regular fast-sailing constant lines from Europe, we can not stand that competition. It is not in the price of goods, it is in this which is the key-note of this whole investigation, the commerce which follows "direct regular communication" which is maintained between European ports and those of Central and South America which has been established, kept alive, and made prosperous by the British policy of aid in the form of subsidies.

This ought to dispose of the question of the prices of goods.

The Senator from Kentucky said that one trouble was that England furnished to these countries immense amounts of manufactured goods and took back the products of those countries, which we would not desire or want, and that therefore a system of exchange existed which naturally resulted in increased trade there which could not apply with us. That is not the fact; it is precisely the other way.

Take Brazil. In 1884—and this illustration is directly in the teeth of the statement of the Senator from Kentucky—the exports of Brazil which came to the United States were $50,266,000. Our exports to Brazil as an offset were only $8,000,000. On the other hand, of the importations into Brazil Great Britain furnished $60,000,000, and only took back of Brazilian products $29,000,000. Where did Brazil get the money to pay Great Britain for the overbalance of trade in her favor with Brazil? From the overplus that we paid her, because the balance of trade was against us. Brazil does not furnish an instance illustrating the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, but on the other hand it is directly and squarely opposed.

Mr. FRYE. I suggest to my colleague right there as a matter of interest that all the best coffee raised in Brazil comes to the United States and none but an inferior article goes to Great Britain.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly, and we pay well for it, and the British get our money. Now, see whether the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky is borne out by other countries. Remember the statement of the Senator from Kentucky that Great Britain furnished more goods because she took back more products and therefore made an adequate exchange. Now, let us see. England enjoys a very large export trade with Venezuela. In 1877 she bought of Venezuelan products $500,000 worth and sold to Venezuela $3,000,000 worth.

Where did the money come from to enable Venezuela to pay that overplus? From the balance of trade against us in the United States. In 1879 England bought $559,000 worth of products of Venezuela and sold that country $2,284,000 worth of manufactured goods. In 1880 she bought $962,000 and sold $2,123,000 worth, of which $1,477,000 worth were cotton goods. The same year Venezuela bought from France $274,000 worth of cotton goods and from the United States only $136,000 worth.

The statements of the Senator from Kentucky upon this subject are not only not borne out by the facts, but are directly contradicted. England furnishes 33 per cent. of the imports into the Argentine Republic and only takes 7 per cent. of her exports, receiving the balance in money, while the United States furnish 8 per cent. of the imports in and takes 13 per cent. of the exports out. It is one story all the way through.

Mr. President, this is a most important subject. It is attended with difficulties; there is no doubt about that. The term "subsidies" is not a favorite one with the American people. More or less prejudice can always be aroused when it is declared that the Government is besought by corporations and monopolies to add to their profits. The history of the country in the past has not been encouraging in this regard; but the conditions never were the same as they are now. When the American Republic undertook for a little while the experiment of subsidizing steamship lines there was no such demand to begin with for our overproduction as there is now. The subject had not been investigated as it has now; American capital was not ready, provided it could be encouraged, as it is now to be put into these lines of steamships that shall open the trade with these neighbors of ours to the south.

Undoubtedly subsidies do not furnish an entire solution of this great question. Other things are needed, but other things will follow. The ame friendly disposition that seeks to open trade with us, and that is willing to give subsidies alongside and in companionship with our subsidies, will lead to the enactment of treaties where reciprocal relations will be established; it will lead to the modification of the stringency of customs laws and rules and regulations; it will lead, it may be, to a common action with reference to exchange and currency. But the question now for the American Congress is whether it shall do this, whether it will make this first effort or do nothing. This is the first step; as I have said it has been always taken as the first step by other countries, and there is arrayed against it for one reason and another every argument and every objection that the Senator from Kentucky with his long experience, his leadership of his party, can invent or present.

He says, to begin with, he does not want this in the form of a subsidy for carrying the mails. That is the road which has been traveled for years by every other power, and in making that objection he declares that the conduct of the Postmaster-General in refusing to carry out the will of Congress as shown by the act of last year was in the interest of a regular and speedy service of the mail. Even if that were so, that sinks into insignificance compared with the greater question of starting and stimulating this flow of commerce that will enrich the American Republic.

But there are two sides to that question. It is a grave question whether even at present, with the small facilities we have with certain American states, the mails could not be better carried in our ships than in what are called the "English tramps." I have just had an instance presented to me giving an account of one of these experiments of the Postmaster-General, as taken from an English paper published in Rio Janeiro. This is the story of the course pursued by the Postmaster-General in putting our mail into foreign vessels instead of taking our own lines or encouraging them. It seems that the Post-Office Department intrusted an English ship about departing for Rio Janeiro with fifty-two bags of mail which were put on board the English ship and refused to the American line. The English ship-master had no responsibility to this Government after he had taken the mails, and when he reached Pernambuco, hundreds and hundreds of miles inside of his destination and of the destination of those fifty-two mail bags, he was able to sell his cargo there. Forthwith he dumped the United States mails on to the wharf at Pernambuco, filled up his ship with what freight he could get and sailed away for England, leaving the United States mail there upon the wharf.

What happened further? In a few days along came a ship of the American line which was sought to be encouraged and stimulated and helped by the act of last year, which Mr. Vilas disregarded, and although there was no obligation whatever, still with that feeling of loyalty and patriotism which the Senator from Kentucky says has nothing to do with this question, the captain of that steamship took the mail voluntarily on his ship and made his way to the port of Rio Janeiro, his destination as well as the destination of this large mail which the Post-Office Department had intrusted to the English tramp-ship; and when he got there, actually because the mail was behind not only did he receive nothing from this Government but he was fined by the Brazilian Government because the mails were late. When he undertook to expostulate and show the situation, the Brazilian officials refused to believe that the American Government had adopted any such policy or had committed its mails to an outside ship in that way, when there was an American line running to the very port.

Still the Senator from Kentucky opposes with all his great might the proposition that is now before the Senate. I am obliged to him for frankly stating that in this opposition he not only represented himself and largely, it may be, his associates upon that side of the Chamber, but that he represented the present Democratic administration, that the President of the United States sustained the Postmaster-General and opposed this proposition; that the Attorney-General of the United States added the weight of his legal opinion to that opposition; and that the Postmaster-General of the United States had taken his stand upon this matter and stood there to-day.

So among the difficulties that beset this enterprise, this first attempt on the part of the American people to open this commerce to us and to give us a portion of its benefit, one of the difficulties that we encounter is that the administration is squarely against us. It holds back, it not only denies aid and succor to this attempt, but in the person of its leader on this floor stands against this proposition, in every form opposes it, and makes war upon it.

That is no light thing. That has never taken place in any other country. While the Senator from Kentucky and the Democratic administration and the Democratic party stand opposed to this project, to this enterprise, the Republican party is in favor of it. I do not mean to say every individual, but that is the bent and bias of the party. It is committed in every way in past administrations and at the present in Congress to an honest attempt to find a market in the ports of our neighbors on the American continent for the immense overproduction of American labor. It seeks to do that because it will enrich the country to begin with. It seeks to do that because it will furnish relief to the distressed condition of labor in America to-day. However much Senators on the other side of the Chamber may be opposed to this policy the Republican party will adhere to it and will look to the American people to sustain it.

We have gone on for years subsidizing railroads, building them up, giving them money without stint, bestowing upon them the public domain to an extent unparalleled. An empire has been given away under which railway lines have opened a way to the Pacific coast and united the two parts of the Republic together, and trade and commerce and fraternity have been brought about by this means. We have given in railroad subsidies 211,000,000 acres of land; we have given in money as subsidies to railroads $108,000,000. The day for that has passed away; we have got through with that. We have built themup; these channels of intercourse and commerce are now established, maintained, and are as enduring as the rocks and the hills. We have passed from that to other considerations, and now there is no question of greater importance confronting the American people, no question of importance involving or touching the prosperity of the American people more important to-day than this effort that is being honestly made here to open an increased commerce and friendly relations with our sister republics upon the American continent. I do not mean for one to cease to work to this end until it is thoroughly understood and appreciated by the American people, and till it becomes a great national issue.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to make any set speech on this occasion, but as the vote that I expect to cast on this measure is not the same that will probably be cast by a majority of my party or by a majority of the Senators who represent Southern territory, I feel that it is proper that I should state some facts and give some reasons why I vote for it.

Under the old order of things prior to the late unfortunate war the Southern people were essentially a planting people; they were farmers and planters. They shipped their cotton, rice, and tobacco abroad, and drew upon it, and it was their interest to purchase in the market wherever they could get commodities the cheapest. They did not look to building up towns or cities by manufacturing establishments, nor did they look to other modes of making money to any considerable extent than those already mentioned. That state of things, however, has passed away, and the South now has to accommodate herself to a different order of things.

We find that if we should all remain cotton planters as our fathers were cotton planters, we would make, as indeed we have already made, an amount of production that would be beyond the demand. Take the last year as an illustration. While many of our people have gone into other pursuits, diversifying industry, we made more cotton than the world desired or needed at a fair price. Consequently there is no little distress now among the Southern people, because Southern planters have to pay debts contracted in the expectation of receiving the ordinary price for cotton with the proceeds of cotton sold at 8 cents per pound instead of 10 cents per pound. This teaches us that we still have too large a proportion of our population engaged in the cultivation of cotton, and that we ought to diversify our industries still more.

Indeed, it seems to my mind that the two things most needed in the South now are education and the diversification of industry. We are making reasonable efforts; indeed, when you take into account our ability, we think we are making liberal efforts to increase the facilities for the education of our people. We are not able to establish as yet such a system of education and to sustain it with such liberality as we desire, but much has been done in that regard, and if the bill which passed the Senate should pass the House of Representatives, as I trust it may, and become a law, we will be greatly relieved in that particular, and within the next ten years the situation will be very materially changed.

But we must not stop there. We must diversify our labor. We must plant less cotton and raise more of other productions and other necessaries of life. Our people are already beginning to realize that state of things, and while it is not easy to change a well-established system in a few years, we have made progress in that regard.

Prior to the war there were scarcely any manufacturing establishments in the South. They were very few; the amount invested was very meager. Now we have centers such as Augusta and Columbus in my State, and others that I might mention, where manufacturing is becoming the principal interest. In the manufacture of cotton we probably have advantages over any other portion of the Union, if we had labor as skilled as theirs, and if we had the necessary amount of capital to invest in that business.

We have had difficulty about procuring skilled labor and we have had a great lack of capital, but, as I have already stated, we have not been idle, and we have accomplished something important in that particular. Indeed I suppose there is probably no place in this country, and there may be none in any other country, where the coarser cotton fabrics, made of good cotton and properly made, can be manufactured more cheaply than can be done in the South. We have advantages over our Northern brethren in that regard. While they have to pay the freights on the raw cotton from our ports to New England ports, say a thousand miles, the cotton grows in the fields around our factories and it costs us virtually nothing of freight to get it to the factory. That is an advantage of no small moment.

Then, again, our climate is more congenial. Our operatives need less expensive clothing than they do in a colder climate; they need less fuel. In a word, the climate is such that they can live on less than they can in New England, and there again is an advantage of no small importance. There are other advantages which I might mention, but will not now take the time. The result is, however, that we produce an excellent fabric of the character I have mentioned.

In regular manufacturing countries, as England and probably New England, the very finest goods are made out of their best cotton, and they make the coarsest goods, such as we make mostly in the South, of inferior cotton. As we raise the cotton in the fields adjacent to the factories and have not manufacturing establishments yet which are adapted to the manufacture of very fine fabrics, we put our best cotton into our very plainest goods. The result is in the Chinese market and in the South American market, when laid down by the side of the English manufactured articles, we have the advantage, because ours is a better article, it is made of better material, and it will probably last double the time that theirs will.

Therefore, when those countries have once learned the value of our cotton goods they can afford to pay a higher price for it than they would pay for the inferior article which they get from England. I recollect three or four years since, when the cotton exposition was held at Atlanta in my State, Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, was kind enough to allow articles on exhibition in the State Department to be shipped to Atlanta and there exhibited as the Government department.

Among other articles were a great many specimens of the cotton goods which are used in China, India, and other Eastern countries, and he sent a specimen very distinctly marked that had been forwarded to the State Department by one of our consuls, I believe, in China, with the goods manufactured out of inferior cotton in England, marked "Augusta Mills, Georgia," and it was sold for the production of the Augusta Mills, Georgia. The Augusta mills are noted for making excellent cloths out of the best quality of cotton. The Englishman had got that idea, and while he could not, as he thought, afford to put his best cotton into the character of goods which he was sending to China, he undertook to impose upon the Chinese by telling them that it was the production of the Augusta Mills, Georgia.

That is one of the diversified interests. We are building up factories every year there as we accumulate capital, and while we are doing it slowly we are making progress, and we will continue to build up, because we possess the advantages of which I have already spoken. For years to come we will manufacture but few of the finer cotton fabrics, but the time will come when we shall manufacture them in great abundance. The time will probably come when the New England capitalist seeking to locate and build a new factory will find it to his interest to go to the South to do so, for the reason that he can now get, and I suppose for a long time to come he can get cheaper labor there than he will get in New England, because the colored labor can be made effective in the cotton factories as has already been shown. He can save large amounts in freight and can save large amounts in clothing, in warming, and in many other respects which I might mention. Therefore, following the dictates of his interest, he will bring his capital in all probability and put it into factories in our section.

But cotton manufacturing is not all that we are doing to diversify labor.

We are blessed in portions of the South with immense deposits of metal, and of coal and iron especially. Prior to the war we made no strides in the development of that great resource. Since the war important steps have been taken in that direction, and there is a constanly growing disposition to invest money largely in the development of that great interest. Capitalists from every section of the Union are coming there and very sensibly putting their money into that great resource of ours.

We have the advantage there in this, that in many localities we have the iron ore and the coal and the limestone, the articles which are necessary in manufacturing pig-iron, in juxtaposition, so near together that there is very little freight and very little inconvenience in getting them together in the furnace. Our Northern brethren generally do not have that advantage except in a few localities. They have to ship either the coke or the iron ore generally over a long line of railroad to bring them together. There are exceptional cases, as I am aware, but we have more probably of the mineral deposits where those articles are all together and near together than you have in Pennsylvania and other portions where the iron business is principally conducted now, and it will probably become the interest of the Northern capitalists seeing this advantage to come and invest their money in those coal and iron lands, which are now very cheap indeed, which can be bought at a price that is insignificant compared with the price that you give for them in Pennsylvania, and they will put establishments there where iron will be manufactured cheaper than it is in Pennsylvania. I suppose well-conducted furnaces in Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee to-day are making iron at from two to three dollars a ton less money than it is made in Pennsylvania.

But there is one offset against this which is to our disadvantage, and that is that we have not capital enough yet to establish rolling-mills where we can convert the pig-iron into the higher qualities of iron. Consequently when we make the pig we have to ship it to the Western markets, as to Saint Louis, Chicago, Terre Haute, Cincinnati, and other Western cities. A portion of our production we ship to Boston, Mass., by sending it to Savannah and putting it on the Boston steamer, where we get a reasonable rate of freight. The result is that we have to pay in increased freight the larger part of the amount that we make by the advantage we have in the manufacture of pig, but as soon as there is capital enough to locate large rolling-mills there our advantage will be permanent over that of most sections of the country. So that in the iron business we are diversifying our labor.

Then there are various other minor interests. For instance, take Atlanta, where there are numerous small establishments in which they are manufacturing small articles. For example we have a factory which employs about a hundred hands in manufacturing paper sacks, such as they need in stores for doing up goods or any other use that they have for a paper sack, and also some cotton sacks. We send them over all parts of the West and over Texas, furnishing a great deal of the supply there.

You may go in Atlanta to an establishment where you can get as good a gold watch manufactured as you can get on this continent. You can get as good a razor at a cutlery establishment there as you can get made anywhere. Many other small articles I might mention where our people see the necessity of diversifying labor. We are taking hold of and putting capital into these little things. We must continue to diversify our labor. Our agricultural labor must be diversified.

We have acted upon an idea there which is of some value. The climate of Southern Georgia is admirably adapted to the raising of watermelons. That seems like a very small, simple business; it does not amount to much; nobody before the war ever thought of selling one. I do not remember the statistics a year ago, but two years ago I recollect there were over 2,500 car-loads of watermelons shipped over the railroad that I represent for the West; and there were other lines open carrying all the time in competition. It brought in no small sum of money. It is a small thing, but yet we find there is money in it. In the southwestern corner of my State we are beginning now to cultivate very extensively the Le Conte pear, which is found to be very popular in the Boston and New York markets, and it sells at very fine prices. They are diversifying labor there again. Then at Griffin, Ga., they are going very extensively into grape-raising, and raising peaches, apples, and many kinds of fruit. In other words, men are abandoning the cotton fields and going into these other branches of industry.

Then again our people are waking up to the importance of raising fine stock. While that industry is in its infancy, we are making progress in it. Our cotton planters are becoming convinced that it will not do to plant cotton alone, but that we must diversify labor and put our hands into every pursuit which we can adopt and make profitable.

In doing that we manufacture a great many goods.

We were told by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who first addressed the Senate on this question that the last steamer which went out to Brazil carried about $25,000 worth of Georgia-manufactured cotton and other commodities from the interior of my State. We must begin to look out for a market. We must do one of two things. We must either fail to make progress and lag in the rear all the time, or we must diversify our labor and our interests and manufacture a great many things that we must send abroad to foreign markets.

There is this advantage in that regard. The manufactured article is usually less bulky and more valuable than the productions of the earth; and therefore we do better to make less of the products of the earth and more manufactured articles for sale and send them abroad. In the West, for instance, they are raising immense quantities of corn. It seems to me it is not their interest, when they can not find much market for corn and wheat, for Congress to try to destroy manufacturing interests and drive the operatives who are now engaged in that business into farming. They will only make a larger quantity of farm products and have no market for them.

It is said that the tariff—and I do not intend to discuss the tariff here at all, but I simply mention the fact incidentally—it is said the tariff discriminates against the farmer all the time; that it never helps him. But if you will destroy the manufacturing establishments by free trade and drive everybody into the field, to raising corn and wheat and cotton, you will soon see that the farmer will not be protected as he is now. He could make his living in the field, his bread and meat, but he could not make the profit that he makes now, because he would soon reach a point where on account of overproduction he could get nothing for his productions; and hence you would destroy his interest and put down the price of his productions by destroying the manufacturing establishments and driving more men into the grain-fields. By your manufacturing establishments you take more labor from the farm and you increase the value of the productions of the farm by creating home markets, and in that way you protect the farmer.

But to the main point here. I have already said more than I expected to say on the points discussed. Not only the North but the South, the East and the West, every part of our country, needs more market. We must dispose to better advantage of our manufactured articles, we must dispose to better advantage of our wheat and other agricultural productions that we make, or we can not get along and prosper. We are told by the report of the commission which we sent to South America that there are to-day 48,000,000 of people inhabiting the sixteen governments to which we sent them, in round numbers you might say 50,000,000 of people, and that their foreign commerce is $800,000,000 a year, and we get a mere fraction of it.

Our exports in 1884 are said to have been $733,000,000 in round numbers, and $64,000,000 of that amount went to all these South and Central American states combined. In other words, less than one-tenth of our foreign exports were sent not to our neighbors, where we ought to control the market, but sent to Europe. Why were they sent to Europe? Because there are regular lines of steamers and transportation facilities are complete between this country and Europe. Therefore we send to Europe and to the Eastern nations, because we have the transportation there. We have it not to the Central and South American powers.

If there is a section of our country now where there is a great deal of rich land and it is so far from railroads that you have to go through two or three cities to get to the one to which you want to ship your commodity, and to reach the point where they want your commodity, that trade can never prosper; but the city which wants trade must take steps to have the railroad built direct to the field where the trade originates, and by doing that you build up important interests there, and you enrich the city which wants the trade.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has just told us that there was a subsidy given to railroads in this country of 211,000,000 acres of land and $108,000,000. That is an immense sum in land and money that we have given to open the highways of commerce, to open the transportation facilities to the great fields of the West, and yet they must have lain there uninhabited for probably half a century if this had not been done. It was wise on the part of the Government to do it. It was sensible, whether it was conducted properly in every case or not. Whether somebody was imposed on or not, or whether some company got more than it ought to have had, is not so much the question. Take it as a whole and there is an immense advantage to the country by this expenditure or by this subsidy, if you call it such.

When we need a market for our commodities, for our manufactured articles, and for the productions of our fields, why is it that we should not put something into vessels on the ocean to go to the rich fields where we can find a market for our productions, and where we can conduct a profitable trade. Is it not sensible to do it? Is it not stupid to neglect to do it? It seems to me it is so. It is not like building a railroad on the land, for there the company has to raise the money and put a large sum into the building of the railroad. That was the case of the subsidies of the Western roads. But when we turn a subsidy toward South America it is not so. God has built the railroad; the ocean is there; it is in complete running condition; all we have to do is to put on the rolling-stock and we can go right into the field that we want to cultivate with our commerce.

It takes, therefore, comparatively a very small amount when we want to reach this immense field with our products, this field where there are $800,000,000 a year of foreign commerce and where we get but about one-tenth of it. If we want to reach that field, and there is a proposition to appropriate $800,000 to aid steamships to reach it, to establish lines where it would be reached, there is an outcry against it, and it is said the principle is all wrong and the policy is all wrong. I confess I can not so see it.

You will allow me to be a little sectional in this matter. I suppose we are all more or less so, like Mr. Benton who, when he spoke of one of the tariff bills, said he himself was almost a free-trader, but when they were making up the bill and came to the article of lead, said he, "I moved 100 per cent. on lead and it carried, for my State produces more lead than any other." As the interest of my section comes in here, I suppose without being offensively sectional in what I may say I may refer to that.

What is the nearest port, the gateway where this trade ought to come in? It is New Orleans, the mouth of the Mississippi River. It is a thousand miles in round numbers nearer than New York. Why should it not come in there? And if it does, what part of this Union is most interested? The North, or New England? No. New York? No. What part? The South and great West. This immense influx of trade should come into New Orleans. In fact if we had the proper communication a vast amount of commerce from the Central and South American states would come in at New Orleans.

Then there is the Mississippi River with all its branches open to you. You keep it open by appropriations from year to year, and you do well. It is open for the whole West. The entrepôt is at New Orleans. There is the depot where commerce will find its resting place or rather its landing place, and then it is distributed to the whole West from that point.

Why is it that the South and West are not both largely interested in opening this trade? Oh, but it takes a few thousand dollars to do it! You can open no great enterprise without its costing you something. Other governments have found that to be true.

I am not going over the figures which the honorable Senator from Maine who last occupied the floor put before you. I believe his statement was that in the aggregate in thirty-six years, commencing in 1848, Great Britain has paid $163,000,000 in subsidies in establishing lines of steamers, in opening communication with all parts of the world where they see that a profitable trade can spring up. France, I understand, pays about a million and a half dollars a year subsidy to one line of steamers from a French port to a Chinese port. Germany has lately entered the field, and she subsidizes very heavily.

What has been the result of their practice? The result has been that they are immensely enriched; that they have taken the trade, and we have lost the trade of South America. It is not only so in South America and Central America, but it is so in other parts of the world. They have succeeded by subsidizing in turning an immense trade that belongs to the United States into English ports. If you do not like the term subsidizing, they have done it by paying high rates for the carriage of mails, as we do here in the West in star routes and other places where we think it necessary; they have succeeded by that means in building up an immense trade of immense profit to them, which we have lost and to which we are entitled, and which we ought to possess. I think we ought to look at their experience; see what has been their policy, what it has cost them, and what the results have been, and if they have made money largely by it, then we might afford to venture something on the same line.

I think therefore the real objection to this amendment is that the amount appropriated is too small. Perhaps while we have not the lines established it would be wise to begin at a small sum. I certainly would not have put it at less than $1,000,000 if I had been drafting it, and I think $2,000,000 would be better. In other words, what is a million a year, or two million a year, or five million a year to the control of the foreign commerce of the Central and South American states? It is a mere bagatelle; it amounts to nothing. Still we are calculating what the small amounts cost us, letting that trade be turned into other channels, and every year we allow it to go there it makes it still harder to turn it back into our channels again.

It seems to me it is time we should wake up upon this subject and go to doing something. Suppose we lose two, or three, or four, or five millions upon it and we find we do not open lines which build up a trade as we expected it to be done. We have lost that amount upon a great many things in past years, and we can afford to risk it here with a very strong probability that it will pay a tenfold return to us. Then why should we not do it?

My friend from Maine who last occupied the floor arraigned the Democratic party upon this question. I do not think he quite does justice. While he intends nothing improper or nothing wrong, I do not think it is just. My friend [Mr. TELLER] says "pretty nearly." The Republican party has been in the control of this Government for twenty-four years. The Republican party had the executive control of the Government every day of twenty-four years, and it had the Congress the larger part of that twenty-four years. This field has been left uncultivated; our trade with the South American states has grown less and less, or if it has not grown actually less it has been dwarfed in comparison with other trades built up there. Why did the Republican party in power permit this?

Mr. DAWES. We had a majority, but always a few on our side joined with you.

Mr. BROWN. I am sorry you could not make them stick.

Mr. DAWES. I am sorry too.

Mr. BROWN. I hope we shall have better luck, for I trust that we shall retain the Government for as long a time as you held it; we ought to have it for twenty-four years too.

Mr. DAWES. If my friend will give the margin a little larger, so as to overcome all the stragglers, we will accomplish something in that way.

Mr. BROWN. As you were not able to control your stragglers they controlled you, and you were not able to do anything for the last twenty-four years.

Mr. DAWES. The trouble is that the stragglers joined the enemy.

Mr. BROWN. If the Democrats take hold of it, though you did not, the object will be attained.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator permit me to ask him if it takes twenty-four years of power to bring the full measure of grace to the Democratic party? If so, it seems to me that their conversion would be rather an expensive job.

Mr. BROWN. As the Senator and his party had control for twenty-four years, as a set-off I think we ought to have it about as long a time, and I hope if we have that you will all be converted to the idea that we have set a good example on this question before the end of our time.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BROWN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HALE. This is not a new thing in Republican administration. The last administration and the administration preceding committed itself to this policy. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia whether during the time that the Democratic party has been in power, since a year ago last March, anything has come from the President of the United States, or from the Democratic House of Representatives, or from any Department of the Government under Democratic administration in any way tending to encourage or inaugurate this policy?

Mr. BROWN. Unfortunately we have been as indolent about that matter as you have been for a long time. We have not done what I think we ought to have done. A majority of my people have thought differently, I have no doubt. I do not know that we ever would do it, but I think we ought to do it, and as you have failed to do it, it seems to me that it is not very well to make a party issue with us on that question.

Mr. HALE. It has been recommended over and over again in messages and reports by Republican administrations.

Mr. BROWN. But you did not control your Republican Houses and have it done when you had them strongly Republican.

Mr. HALE. We set on foot the commission to make the investigation which has furnished the very valuable facts the Senator has been using and which I and others have used, and laid the foundation for future legislation, which if adopted will inaugurate this policy.

Mr. BROWN. With great deference to the Senator, I do not exactly understand it so. I find that on the 3d of March, 1884, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] introduced the bill making provision for the appointment of the commission; and it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think the measure had a Democratic origin. That watchful, able, vigilant Senator, who is certainly a great honor to his people, saw the necessity of it. I do not say that he is for subsidies, because I have no right to speak for him on that question, but he saw the necessity of opening this great trade by some means to our people, and he introduced a bill for the appointment of a commission to visit those governments and see what could be done with it. It was not his bill exactly which passed, because the committee changed it some, but substantially it was.

Mr. HALE. The history of that bill was that the Republican Senate adopted it but the Democratic House failed to pass it.

Mr. BROWN. After it had been recommended by a Democratic Senator you took it up.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think the Senator from Missouri will vote with him on the question we are now considering?

Mr. BROWN. I stated distinctly that I do not know his views on this question, and that I had no right to commit him. He may not think this the right mode of doing it at all; but he thought something ought to be done on that line to secure that trade, and he went to work to get it by negotiations and made a very important step in the right direction. I am very glad that the Republicans fell into line and did what it was wise to do under the circumstances.

Mr. HALE. The Republicans did not fall into line, but the Republican Senate adopted it and the Democratic House rejected it, and it was only after it was matured in conference that finally we got out of it certain features which saved the commission, but it was by a contest with the Democratic House that we did it.

Mr. BROWN. Still the Democratic House agreed to it.

Mr. HALE. Yes; because we would not give it up.

Mr. BROWN. If they had not wanted it you could not have got it. The Democratic House did pass it, not exactly in the same form that we passed it, but finally agreed to it. Therefore, both parties in both Houses agreed to it, but it had a Democratic origin. It does not seem to me that the party view presented is a wise one, or that it is wise for the Republican party in the minority to undertake to make it an issue.

But, Mr. President, I have said substantially what I desired to say. I have in my hand an address of William E. Curtis, late commissioner of the United States to Central and South America, one of the commissioners appointed under the act to which I have referred, which has a great many very valuable statistics in it. I desire to incorporate seven or eight pages of the address as part of my speech, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may be permitted to put it in my speech without reading it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BROWN. The extracts from the address of Mr. Curtis to which I refer are as follows:

South of the Rio Grande and the Gulf of Mexico, in what is known as Spanish-America, are about 48,000,000 of people, engaged in a foreign commerce amounting to over $800,000,000 a year. This commerce is about equally divided between exports and imports. The exports consists exclusively of raw products, and always will; while the imports consist of manufactured merchandise. The Spanish-American people have no taste for mechanical industry, and lack the water-power or the fuel to exercise it if they had. They will always be compelled to import all the luxuries and nearly all of the necessaries of life except food, and their wealth must come from the boundless resources with which a prodigal nature has stored the continents.

In 1884 our exports were valued at $733,768,764, mostly manufactured merchandise. Of this amount we exported but $64,719,000 to Spanish America. Our annual mechanical and agricultural products are valued at $15,000,000,000, but we seldom have sold more than $75,000,000 worth of this product to our nearest neighbors, who buy in Europe many times as much as they ever get here.

We have more trade with either Belgium, Italy, The Netherlands, Spain, Switzerland, Russia, China, Japan, Australia than we have with all of the Central American States combined. We have nearly as much trade with Greece as we have with Chili. We sell more sewing-machines in Switzerland than we sell in Chili, and Switzerland sells Chili more sewing-machines than she buys of us.

England, France, and Germany have secured a monopoly of the trade of Spanish America, by the establishment of quick, regular, and cheap transportation, and we have lost it by neglect. For example, Bolivia has a foreign trade of over $16,000,000 a year, yet the name of that country does not appear in the tables of our Bureau of Statistics. The chief imports of Bolivia are cotton and woolen goods, agricultural implements, mining machinery, hardware, cutlery, clocks, watches, canned goods, and provisions, a list which could be filled in any commercial city of the United States as cheaply as in Europe, and yet the annual reports of the Treasury Department do not show a dollar's worth of commerce between the United States and that country.

The same conditions exist with other nations in quite as startling a form.

In 1884 the value of manufactured merchandise imported into the several countries of Central and South America was as follows:

Central America:
Mexico	$30,000,000
Guatemala	3,000,000
Honduras	750,000
Salvador	2,750,000
Nicaragua	3,250,000
Costa Rica	2,800,000
British Honduras	1,250,000
		$44,300,000
South America:
French Guiana	1,500,000
Dutch Guiana	1,700,000
British Guiana	10,800,000
Venezuela	16,000,000
Colombia	13,700,000
Ecuador	4,375,000
Bolivia	4,500,000
Chili	52,600,000
Peru	7,600,000
Argentine Republic	84,900,000
Uruguay	20,000,000
Paraguay	1,300,000
Brazil	101,000,000
		325,975,000
West Indies		117,113,000
Grand total		487,388,000

The figures showing the distribution of these imports for 1884 can not yet be obtained, but the exports of the United States, France, and Great Britain to the countries named below in 1883 were as follows:

Countries.	United States.	Great Britain.	France.
Central America	$2,003,407	$4,186,893	$1,392,113
Colombia	6,868,971	6,009,414	5,984,352
Venezuela	2,403,705	3,126,123	1,324,468
Brazil	9,252,094	34,140,119	15,657,473
Uruguay	1,452,812	9,683,712	5,111,211
Argentine Republic	3,543,196	30,695,963	24,956,691
Chili	2,860,496	21,318,312	9,655,555
Peru	493,894	4,811,600	1,760,670
Total	28,878,625	113,972,136	65,843,533

The increase of the imports from Great Britain into the Argentine Republic in 1884 was very large, and reached a total of $38,000,000. There was a corresponding increase in most of the other countries.

The following shows the exports from England, France, and the United States to Mexico, Central and South America, the Spanish West Indies, Hayti, and San Domingo of cotton goods, iron and steel, machines and implements, and hardware and cutlery, the goods in which we excel:

Articles.	England.	France.	United States.
Cotton manufactures	$45,738,000	$6,215,000	$4,563,000
Iron and steel	11,090,000	3,339,000	2,810,000
Machinery, engines, &c.	8,022,000	1,157,000	6,820,000
Hardware and cutlery	3,505,000	114,000	1,254,000
Total principal articles	68,355,000	10,825,000	15,447,000

Our total exports to Mexico are greater than those of either England or France, while our total exports to South America are less than one-fourth of those of England, and only one-half of those of France.

During the last twenty years the value of the exports from the United States to the Spanish Americans was $442,048,975, and during that time we purchased of them raw products to the amount of $1,185,828,579, showing an excess of imports during the twenty years amounting to $765,992,219, which was paid in cash. It will thus be seen that our commerce with Central and South America has left a very large balance on the wrong side of the ledger, while those countries have all the time been buying in Europe the very merchandise we have for sale.

Being the very reverse of the United States in climate and resources, they constitute our natural commercial allies, and the exchange should at least be even; but they sell their raw products here and buy their manufactured articles in Europe. The principal reason for this is that the carrying trade is in the hands of Englishmen. The statistics show that of the total imports into the United States from Spanish America, which in 1884 amounted to $159,000,000, three-fourths were carried in foreign vessels. Of our exports to those countries, amounting last year to $64,000,000, $46,000,000 were carried in American vessels, while only $18,000,000 were carried by foreign vessels. It will thus be seen that nearly everything we buy is brought to us from Spanish America by Englishmen, while nearly everything we sell we have to carry there ourselves. The logic of these facts is irresistible.

The most absurd spectacle in the commercial world is the trade we carry on with Brazil. We buy nearly all her raw products, while she spends the money we pay for them in England and France.

In 1884 of the exports of Brazil $50,266,000 went to the United States, $29,000,000 to England, and $24,000,000 to France. Of the imports of Brazil in 1884, $30,000,000 came from England, $15,000,000 from France, and $8,0..0,000 from the United States.

Another peculiar feature of this commerce was that of the exports of Brazil to the United States, $32,000,000 was carried in English vessels and $9,000,000 in American vessels, while of her imports from the United States $6,000,000 was carried in American vessels and only $2,000,000 in English vessels. The trade is carried on by triangular voyages. Two lines of steamships sailing under the British flag load every week at Rio for New York. Arriving at the latter port they place their cargoes of coffee and hides in the hands of commission merchants, and sail for Europe, where they draw against these consignments, and buy Manchester cotton, Birmingham hardware, and other goods which they carry to Brazil.

During the last twenty years this absurd spectacle has cost the United States $600,000,000, every cent of which has gone into the pockets of English and French manufacturers. We have not only paid for the goods that England has sold Brazil, but as we have had no banking connections with that country and no ships on the sea, nearly every ton of this commerce has paid a tax to English bankers and vessel-owners.

Several years ago when we removed the import tax on coffee, Brazil put an export duty on, so that the attempt of Congress to secure a cheap breakfast for the workingman simply resulted in diverting several million dollars from the Treasury of the United States into the treasury of Brazil, without changing the price of the article. Mexico and the countries washed by the Caribbean Sea produce a better quality of coffee than is grown in Brazil, and if the United States Government would consent to discriminate against Brazilian coffee raised by slave labor the nations of Central America and the Spanish Main would reciprocate by admitting free to their ports our flour, lumber, provisions, lard, dairy products, kerosene, and other articles which are now kept from the common people by an almost prohibitory tariff.

Brazil is in such a critical condition, financially and commercially, that if we did not buy her coffee it would rot on the trees, and the Englishmen who control her foreign commerce would have to close their warehouses and throw all the Brazilian planters into the bankrupt court. These Englishmen have secured mortgages upon the plantations of Brazil by supplying the planters with merchandise on credit and taking the crop at the end of the season in payment; but as the crop seldom pays the advances, the mortgages have been lapping over upon the plantations, until now the Englishmen have the Brazilians by the throat, making their own terms, charging one profit on the merchandise sold, another as interest on the advances, a third on the coffee purchased, and a fourth as interest on payments deferred, while they make three profits out of us: first, on coffee they sell us; second, on transportation charges; third, in discounting our bills on London.

The greater part of our exports to Spanish America go to Mexico and the West Indies. Deducting these from the total, it will be found that we buy over 30 per cent. of what the South American countries have for sale, and furnish them only 6 per cent. of their imports. The balance of trade goes on piling up at the rate of nearly $100,000,000 a year. This was not always so. Twenty years ago more than half the commerce of this hemisphere was controlled by the merchants of New York, Boston, and Baltimore, and more than half the ships in its harbors sailed from those ports. Now only a small percentage of the carrying trade is done in American bottoms, while English ship-owners who control the transportation facilities permit the Spanish-American merchants to buy in this country only such goods as they can not obtain elsewhere.

The cause of this astonishing phenomenon is our neglect to furnish the ways and means of commerce. We can no more prevent trade following facilities for communication than we can repeal the law of gravity. While we have been pointing with pride at our internal development, England and France have been stealing our markets away from us. The problem of recovering them is easy of solution. The states of Central and South America will buy what we have to sell if intelligent measures are used to cultivate the markets and means are provided for the delivery of the goods.

The Spanish-American nations seek political intimacy with the United States, and look to this, the mother of republics, for example and encouragement. They recognize and assert the superiority of our products. They offer and pay subsidies to our ships. Brazil now pays $100,000 a year as a subsidy to an American steamship line, while the United States Government paid only $4,000 last year to the same line for carrying our mails. The Argentine Republic had a law upon its statute-books representing a standing offer of a subsidy of 96,000 silver dollars a year to any company that will establish a steamship line between Buenos Ayres and New York, under the American flag, and at the same time has twenty-one lines of steamships, sailing from forty-five to sixty vessels a month, between Buenos Ayres and the ports of Europe, to which it pays nothing. We have no steamship communication with the Argentine Republic whatever. During the last year, out of the millions of tons of shipping represented in the harbor of that metropolis, there were no steamers from the United States, and our flag was seen upon but 2 per cent. of the sailing vessels. Here is a nation purchasing in Europe $70,000,000 worth of merchandise every year, and only spending about $4,000,000 in the United States, and these $4,000,000 represent articles such as petroleum, lumber, lard and other pork products, which could not elsewhere be obtained.

Thomas W. Howard, United States vice-consul at Uruguay, stated to the commission that the carrying trade between that country and Europe was done by 567 steamers, of which 203 were English, 118 French, 107 German, 48 Italian, and 14 Spanish, with not one under the American flag; and he said that no steamers ever came from the United States to Uruguay except occasionally an English tramp, chartered for a special cargo. The foreign commerce of Uruguay amounts to $45,000,000 a year, of which over $20,000,000 are imports of manufactured merchandise. The chief imports are wearing apparel, iron and steel goods, agricultural implements, and machinery. England furnishes 27 per cent., France 17 per cent., Germany 13 per cent., Spain 10 per cent., Italy 6 per cent., and the United States only 5 per cent.

The Spanish Americans erect statues to Washington and Lincoln, and imitate the United States in all their political and economical endeavors. Their republics are founded upon constitutions in imitation of that our fathers framed. They have introduced our school system and they import teachers from the United States.

Even more surprising than our neglect of the commercial opportunities they offer is our ignorance of their condition and progress. We recollect their civilization as we saw it last, to be an anarchy of errors. We do not realize that the triumph of liberal intelligence and the influx of modern enterprise have opened to the nations of South and Central America a destiny second only in promise to our own. While it would be useless to seek in those republics an ideal of self-government, their progress in the last half-century has placed them in a situation where their political reform is not only hopeful but assured.

The development of the southern half of South America is nearly as rapid as that of the United States. Immigration is flooding in, internal improvements are opening new and fertile fields, and wealth is increasing in a ratio enjoyed by no other section of the globe.

Chili, Uruguay, Paraguay, and the Argentine Republic, almost a terra incognita to us, are booming like our Western Territories. In 1876 the imports of the Argentine Republic were valued at $36,000,000; in 1884 they had reached $80,000,000. In 1876 the merchandise brought to that country from England, France, and Germany was valued at only $18,000,000, while in 1884 it was more than $53,000,000. The entire imports from the United States for twenty years were $6,000,000 less than those from the three commercial nations of Europe for the year 1884.

Within the last three months the Government of the Argentine Republic has made contracts for $59,000,000 worth of railway improvements, including a line of road northward in Bolivia and two lines across the continent to Chili, so as to bring the commerce of the Pacific Slope into the harbor of Buenos Ayres, instead of taking it around the Straits of Magellan.

In 1874 the foreign commerce of Chili amounted to $42,000,000. In 1884 it reached $132,000,000. From $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 in merchandise is imported into Chili every year, of which England furnishes over $20,000,000, France over $12,000,000, Germany over $8,000,000, and the United States $3,000,000.

Adding the imports of Brazil to those of Uruguay, Chili, and the Argentine Republic, it will be found that the aggregate value of manufactured products introduced into those four countries annually reaches the enormous sum of $250,000,000, of which England furnishes nearly one-half, France about $50,000,000, Germany about $35,000,000, and the United States about $17,000,000.

We have no adequate conception of the present magnitude of these markets, nor of their prospective value. The manufacturers of the United States can supply almost every article represented in that $250,000,000, with the exception of a few articles of luxury which we ourselves import. The consumption of cotton goods alone amounts annually to over $65,000,000, and 95 per cent. is supplied by the mills of Manchester.

* * * * * * *

The balance of trade against the United States with these countries of Central and South America amounts annually to nearly $100,000,000. This balance is paid in bills of exchange on London, the proceeds of which are expended there in the purchase of merchandise which our markets could supply at as low figures and in as good quality as that of Europe. It was remarked nearly everywhere that English merchants of whom the South American importers were buying their goods might not accept such a coin in payment, and the reply invariably was that in such an event they would come to the United States to buy their goods. All commercial transactions in these countries now are calculated in pounds, shillings, and pence, the local currency never entering into foreign commercial transactions.

* * * * * * *

Our Government might have received concessions for the admission of our peculiar products free, or at a reduced rate of duty, had we been enterprising enough to enter negotiations in that direction. Almost everywhere the South American commission found a willingness on the part of the governments it visited to enter into commercial treaties whereby our peculiar products might be relieved from the almost prohibitory taxation, without any further concessions upon our part beyond giving the pledge not to impose duties where they do not now exist.

With the exception of petroleum, nearly all of our exports to Central and South America come from the Southern States and the Northwest, and consist of breadstuffs, provisions, lumber, furniture, &c. Flour is so expensive that none but the rich can use it, the price often being as high as $25 a barrel, two-thirds of this cost representing the import duty. If the duty upon flour were removed in all the South American countries the exports from the United States would be very largely increased, and the removal of that duty could be obtained by an exchange in favor of sugar, while the almost prohibitory duty upon lumber, provisions, and other goods would be given in exchange for the removal of the duty on carpet wools.

Petroleum is a very important item in the commerce of South America. Gas is scarce and high, owing to the lack of fuel, and almost the entire population burn candles. Petroleum put on board a ship at 15 cents a gallon in New York is peddled out in South American cities in pint bottles at 25 cents each, or 40 cents for a quart bottle, the light of a single lamp for an evening costing at least a quarter of a dollar, which of course prohibits its use by the common people.

Three-fourths of this price represents the duty, as it is the practice of the South American governments to tax the necessaries of life and admit the luxuries free. As an illustration: A certain government which charges a duty of 400 per cent. ad valorem on our kerosene oil admits watches, jewelry, and diamonds at a duty of 90 cents a pound.

The yield of gold and silver in the Central and South American states is $56,000,000 annually, a large proportion of which goes to Europe to be coined. As these states are among the largest producers of the precious metals in the world, and as we could make arrangements with them to pay balances in silver, it would give us the opportunity to pay nearly $100,000,000 a year of balance against us in silver, which we now pay in gold.

The following tables show the value of merchandise imported into the several independent states of Central and South America, and the share of the United States in that trade:

Country.	From all countries.	From the United States.
Argentine Republic	$84,000,000	$4,327,026
Brazil	100,000,000	7,258,085
Central American states	14,000,000	2,667,943
Chili	52,000,000	2,192,672
Peru	7,600,000	716,001
United States of Colombia	13,700,000	5,397,412
Uruguay	26,000,000	1,601,759
Venezuela	16,000,000	2,992,968
All other countries	10,500,000	425,563

The above table shows that our share is exceedingly small.

The following statement shows the commerce between the several ports of the Southern States and Central and South America, for the year ending June 30, 1885:

Port.	Amount.	Port.	Amount.
Apalachicola, Fla	$27,000	Galveston, Tex	$663,000
Brunswick, Ga	420,000	New Orleans, La	4,885,000
Fernandina, Fla	41,000	Yorktown, Va	529,000
Wilmington, N. C	60,000	Pearl River, Miss	85,000
Mobile, Ala	119,000	Saint Johns, Fla	20,000
Pensacola, Fla	417,000	Charleston, S. C	46,000
Savannah, Ga	616,000
Saint Mary's, Ga	10,000	Total	9,092,000
Richmond, Va	1,254,000

The statement just given shows the large interest of the South in this trade. Most of this immense commerce should be diverted to this country, and should come in at the ports of New Orleans, Tampa, Fla., Savannah, Charleston, Wilmington, and Norfolk. While Northern cities would get a large share also, the greater part would naturally come to the South, and through the South when going West.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I am very sorry that this proposition comes to us in the manner it does, because I am somewhat in sympathy with the measure. But it comes as an amendment to an appropriation bill after both the House and the Senate have resolved not to continue longer the practice, and a very bad practice, of putting new legislation upon appropriation bills. It seems to me as though it would be far wiser to have introduced this as an independent measure, and let it take its chances as an independent proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me I wish he would explain to the Senate how this is legislation. This is an appropriation for carrying the mails.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understand. It is an appropriation as the Senator says for carrying the mails but it proposes to do more. The mails are now carried by appropriations already made, and which have been made in former years. It is proposed to give a subsidy to a steamship line to carry the mails directly from here to South America and the islands of the sea and to make a specific appropriation by way of subsidy. There seems something new in this.

Let me say to the Senator that I am in sympathy with the proposition. I do not believe the United States Government are paying adequately for the transportation of the mails on the sea. I think that more should be paid. Last year we eliminated from the statute-books a law which required a steamship company to keep its ship tied up at the dock at the pleasure of the Government until such time as the Government could get its mails on board, often at great expense and delay to the steamship line, and then receive and transport the mails at such rates as the Government itself would fix; and as to the South American mails the compensation fixed was far below the cost of doing the work. No great government can afford to treat its citizens in this unjust manner; yet it did, and as a consequence the law was rightly repealed.

I think to-day in some cases we are requiring steamship lines to carry the United States mails to foreign countries for less than it costs to transport the mail from the post-office to the dock at the point of shipment and from the dock to the post-office at the point of destination. I claim that that is unbecoming a great Government and should not be done. But I think the pending amendment has no place upon this appropriation bill.

I have heard it repeatedly said upon this floor that under the new rules organized in another body the appropriation bills were coming to us in a much better form than ever before; that they do not require one-half the labor in their preparation. They are reported here speedily and apparently the Committee on Appropriations do not give one-half the time to their consideration that they have heretofore required. There seems to be a perfect agreement as to the matters contained in the bills; and now we are doing what? We are ingrafting upon this measure a proposition already rejected by the other House to be sent back to that body.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. MCPHERSON. You need not call me to order; I will take back that part of my statement if not in order to refer to the better end of the capitol.

As I said before, I am somewhat in sympathy with this measure and I am in sympathy with it for this reason: I believe it to be the duty of the United States Government to open so far as it can trade relations with the South American states, states lying contiguous to us almost and right upon our southern border, easy of access and capable in a few years of taking almost the entire surplus manufacturing product of this country and consuming it.

Therefore I think the Government should adopt some policy at least that would enable our people to come in direct contact with the consumers of goods in that country by direct and speedy communication.

But this amendment proposes to go further. The simple reading of the amendment will show how extended it is in its proposed operations. We find here that it is to secure greater frequency and regularity and dispatch in the carriage of such mails to Brazil, the republics of New Mexico, Central and South America. With that I agree; but you add the Sandwich, the West India and Windward Islands, New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies, for I understand it is proposed to set aside a certain portion of this appropriation for the purpose of establishing mail facilities with those islands, and I think that is entirely unnecessary and inexpedient at the present time.

Mr. PLUMB. What islands does the Senator include?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I include the Sandwich, the West India and the Windward Islands, New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies, as the Senator will see when I offer my amendment to strike out these islands.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will let me interrupt him for a moment I will state to him that in the report of the Postmaster-General there is printed a petition signed by a very large number, in fact I think all, the prominent merchants of San Francisco, of date of April, last year, asking him very urgently to use the money that was appropriated in the last Post-Office appropriation act for the purpose of establishing more frequent communication with the Sandwich Islands, in which it is set out that the trade between the Sandwich Islands and the United States amounted to $172 per head of each one of the people of those islands, far in excess of our trade with Japan and China, Sweden and Norway, the Austrian Empire, and in fact two-thirds of all the remaining countries of the world.

Mr. MCPHERSON. We do not propose to establish a steamship line to carry the mail to Europe. I presume quite likely you can get a petition signed by fifty or one hundred people for almost any purpose. If the Senator will allow me to call his attention to the third page of the bill, I find there a proviso in the shape of new legislation also, which proposes the establishment, as I understand it, of a steamship line from Tampa to the West India Islands.

It is well known that the West India Islands are connected by the very best steamboat communication possible to be secured anywhere, and the mail going from Havana to Tampa daily would be distributed among the West India Islands just as expeditiously, if not more so, than by any proposed establishment of a line between any port in the United States and each one of those islands individually. Provision having been made for the West India Islands in that direction it is entirely unnecessary that any part of this $800,000 which it is proposed to apply for this purpose should be used for any such purpose as that.

Again, let us take the Sandwich Islands. The Sandwich Islands already have trade relations with the United States which give them great advantages over almost any producing country anywhere within many thousands of miles of the United States. The advantage which we give to the Sandwich Islands in its trade relations with us upon the article of sugar alone has tended to establish lines of communication between our ports and the Sandwich Islands which have given us as good mail facilities as could possibly be given by any that could be possibly secured under this bill with an increased appropriation. Certainly no new or speedier lines will take the place of those now doing the service, and the money this bill bestows in that direction would be only in the nature of a gift to existing lines.

Will any Senator rise in his place and tell me what we have to gain by establishing speedy mail communications or trade relations with New Caledonia, the penal colony of Great Britain, with New Zealand, or the Australian colonies? How can we expect to transport our goods, manufactured in this country from raw material (as the Senator from Kentucky said yesterday, and in that regard I fully agree with him), upon much of which a large duty has been charged, an embargo, so to speak, laid at our own port before it enters into the factory where it is manufactured into products for export, thereby largely increasing the cost of that product? How can we expect by establishing mail facilities with a colony of Great Britain to compete with that country which has free trade between herself and her own colonies?

Mr. DAWES. What are the raw materials to which the Senator refers?

Mr. McPHERSON. I suppose wool is very largely a raw material of Australia which goes to Great Britain, but which can not come here. I suppose Great Britain very largely gets her cotton product from India, and also sends her cotton product direct to Australia in exchange for cheap wool. But I only use this argument to show how perfectly absurd it is for us to undertake to establish trade relations with a colony of Great Britain with this vast world of republics lying near our own door, which are to-day in sympathy with us in everything that goes to make up national sympathy and national prosperity; we ought to devote our whole attention, and if any money is to be expended, we should expend it in that direction.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the Senator in all that; but when the Senator spoke of the awful tax put upon the raw materials that were brought here and manufactured I was wondering what the raw materials were.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will put it all in a single sentence and then the Senator can understand me. Believing with him as I do very greatly upon the policy pursued by the fathers, which is to collect the taxes through the custom-house to support the National Government, I want to say to him here and now, and to every Senator within the sound of my voice, that it is perfectly absurd for us to undertake to build up the commerce of this country until we make raw material which comes to us from every part of the world in exchange for our own products, and which enters into the cost of our manufactured goods, as free as the sunlight and the air. All commerce is barter, and unless you can load your ships outward and inward bound your boasted commerce, even with subsidies, is a myth.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey whether he thinks raw material ought to come in free when we have it at our door?

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to say to the Senator that as to raw material already at our doors and which we raise in great abundance, we need not import it; but I would admit raw material duty free, whether produced by us or not, if needed by manufacturers.

Mr. DAWES. On the same level?

Mr. McPHERSON. Not upon exactly the same level; but I say until you reduce the tariff very largely upon raw products not produced in this country and which enter into the consumption of our manufactures and restrict the area of our market, unless you do that you never will increase the sales of our products.

Mr. DAWES. While the Senator is on that point I wish to say that I asked the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yesterday to point out what profit it could be to anybody to go to a foreign country and pay for all the cost of going there for raw material produced at home?

Mr. McPHERSON. What benefit?

Mr. DAWES. What benefit is it to anybody?

Mr. McPHERSON. There are a great many varieties of raw material——

Mr. DAWES. Let me say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that the rule expressly requires Senators to address the Chair, and that one Senator shall not interrupt another unless by his consent.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator has my consent.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the Senator that every article of raw material that enters into a manufacture in this country that can not be produced here in this country should be made free, and not only free but every facility to bring it here should be made as easy and as cheap as possible; but as to any raw material that lies at our door and can be just as well produced here as it is produced in a foreign country, all that we pay to send after it and bring it here is so much thrown away.

Mr. McPHERSON. Well, Mr. President, to answer that argument would take a pretty long time. I will only say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I suppose there are a great many articles grown in this country that would compete with foreign products. I do not suppose we can raise jute in this country to advantage; but what is made from that product? The bags that carry our grain from here to foreign markets. California to-day uses millions of dollars' worth of the jute product, and were it not for the jute coming from abroad we would have to use bags the cost of which would be so greatly increased that our wheat-growers could not use the market in which they attempt to compete.

I do not suppose the Senator from Massachusetts would say that it was for the interest of the people of California to impose a heavy duty upon the jute product, which would simply prohibit the exportation of wheat. I do not suppose the Senator from Massachusetts would say that as to the wool product. In some of the outlying provinces of the world, for, instance, in Southern Russia and in Australia, the wool is sold on the market, as I saw the quotations the other day, for 4½*d.* per pound, upon which our tariff levies a duty of 10 cents a pound. I do not suppose the Senator expects the people of the United States to believe that they can grow wool at 4½*d.* a pound even on the great prairies of the United States. This cheap wool makes cheap clothing and carpets and blankets, and gives comfort to the poor. Mixed with our finer wools, the only kind we produce, or can profitably produce, it makes a great variety of cloths suitable for export, and in this way makes a new use for our own better wools. Free wool of the cheap grades would benefit alike the wool producer and manufacturer.

Again, I do not suppose the Senator from Massachusetts believes for a single moment that we can load ships in New York, even if this bill becomes a law, and transport cotton goods from New York to Rio de Janeiro and there sell them for money when the British competitor is in the same market with his cotton goods and barters with them for the products of Brazil. The Brazilian has no money with which to pay. He says, "For your cotton goods I will give you the raw products of my country. I will take your cottons, but you must take my products."

Mr. FRYE rose.

Mr. McPHERSON. I refuse to yield at this moment.

Mr. FRYE. But the Senator is making a very grave misstatement there.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then you can contradict it when your opportunity arrives, for I am now answering a like charge from Massachusetts.

You make a shipment of cotton goods to Rio de Janeiro. Let the raw products of Brazil come back on the same ship to the port of New York, and pay a duty of 40 per cent., and the goods into which it is manufactured, say for the Brazilian market again, costs to make what it costs the English manufacturer plus this duty.

Mr. FRYE. What does the Senator mean when he says——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. What does the Senator mean when he says England has a barter-trade with Rio de Janeiro and we have not?

Mr. McPHERSON. All commerce is barter. We can not have barter when the custom-house in New York lays an embargo upon the thing we barter for. To do this is to strangle commerce.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator know that last year we imported fifty million dollars' worth of coffee from Rio de Janeiro on which there is no duty in the port of New York, and that we only sold Brazil eight million dollars' worth of goods back again?

Mr. McPHERSON. Most assuredly. That proves nothing. Now, if the Senator will be fair with his argument and take something upon which there is a duty, then he will present the thing fairly to the American people.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator's statement was that we could not hope to enjoy a trade with one of these countries when the essence of barter was out, and he cited Great Britain as being able to carry on a barter trade with Rio de Janeiro, Great Britain taking Rio de Janeiro's goods and Rio de Janeiro taking in pay Great Britain's goods; and yet the Senator knows that Great Britain did not take as many goods from Rio de Janeiro last year as we did and she sold her five times as much as we did.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very true. Why should Great Britain take the goods? Because she can buy them and barter them to better advantage than we can. We need a certain amount of coffee in this country and our people will buy it. The Senator will have it upon his breakfast table whether it costs a cent a pound or 40 cents a pound. There is no proof in that. What I want the Senator and every Senator to understand is that while sympathizing with that side of the house as everybody knows upon the doctrine of collecting our revenue by a tariff at the custom-house, I believe that unless you reduce the duties on raw material of every kind, unless you throw down the barriers at the custom-house and let those things come in free which tend to make and cheapen the products of manufactured industry, you might as well take the money you propose to grant in this bill for speedy mail service to increase commerce and throw it in the Potomac River.

I say a new era must be entered upon in this country; a new line of policy is required. We are to-day the granary of the world, and there is no reason why we should not be its workship also. What we want is the raw material that enters into the manufacturing industries of this country, of every kind and grade and quality for the purpose of making a fine product as cheaply for the world as it can be made by any other nation. Then comes your commerce, for without that you can have no commerce and no trade with foreign nations.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator represents a manufacturing State, and I do not. He has undoubtedly in his own person, at all events his people have, whatever benefits have been derived from what is called the protective policy. He is now speaking of a new era. General principles do not satisfy any stomach. I will be glad to have him state, as a representative of New Jersey, some of the articles of manufacture on which he would take off the duty. Certainly I will go with him on whatever he may name.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not understand that that has any connection with the argument under consideration; yet at the same time I am ready to answer that suggestion of the Senator. I do not know that there is any industry in New Jersey upon which the tariff might be reduced with profit either to the capital involved in the industry or to the labor there employed. I do not suppose it could be, and I want to say to the Senator and to Senators on this side of the Chamber, to rebut an argument that I have heard advanced here a thousand times that the duty levied upon manufactured products was simply a tax which the purchasers of goods always had to pay, I deny all such propositions.

I think there is not an article manufactured in the country to-day upon which there may be a duty, say of 35 or 30 per cent., that will be sold to the consumer for 2 per cent. above cost irrespective of the protection which the tariff gives. In short, the demand determines the value of things in the home market. The only thing that the tariff does is to preserve the home market for the home manufacturer. It does nothing more. I say it is not a tax to the extent of the duty upon the consumer.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, will the Senator from New Jersey be kind enough to say, if the manufacturers of New Jersey can not stand a reduction of duty, whether he can find some other State and name some articles that some surrounding States will allow us a reduction upon without injuring American capital, or American labor, or the American foreign trade?

Mr. MCPHERSON. That does not touch the question.

Mr. PLUMB. Out of this generalization I want to come to something particular.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I did not mean to discuss the tariff question. I was drawn into it; but at the same time I am willing to answer proper interrogatories suggested by anything I have said.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask a question. The Senator from New Jersey has laid much stress on the fact that we ought to have raw material free, and he has instanced two things, jute for one, which would not keep a quarter of a million of men at work if we manufactured all the jute material that we now both manufacture and buy. He has also instanced very cheap wool, at 4 cents a pound or something like that. Now, I wish he would designate something else in the way of raw material that enters into our manufactures that we raise the duty on which he thinks ought to be reduced.

Mr. MCPHERSON. With all due respect to the Senator I will say to him that I never jump until I reach the stile. If a tariff bill shall be brought here from the House of Representatives I will be very willing to take the matter into consideration.

Now, Mr. President, to return to this bill, I move to strike out, in line 104, after the words "South America," the words—

The Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies—

Because I do not believe it to be the policy of this Government at the present time, with these large undeveloped South American republics to be attended to, to undertake to hunt up the islands of the sea for the purpose of spending some part of the $800,000 this bill appropriates. After that, in order that the Senate may understand the full force of my amendment, I shall then move that the word "eight," in line 106, be stricken out and that the word "five" be substituted, so as to make the amount $500,000. In short, if any part of the appropriation of $800,000 is to be appropriated to furnishing mail facilities to these islands, I would simply subtract that from the sum total and leave the appropriation for the other purpose.

Mr. PLUMB. It may be well for the Senator to know that the Australia colonies already pay a subsidy of $100,000 a year to insure the establishment and connection of a steamship line between those colonies and California. They have done that on the idea of the benefits of communication between this country and their own country. I will state further that it has been found to be a very valuable connection. It is valuable because in the first place their commerce is increasing. They are an enterprising people and a people who, while under the British dominion, still are so far separated from the mother country that they can more easily and cheaply get trade better from the American Republic than they can at home, not being a manufacturing but rather an agricultural and pastoral people.

In regard to the amount the Senator suggests, and as to the time, inasmuch as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] made the point of order, I hope the Senator from New Jersey will consent to withdraw his motion until the point of order is determined in order that the construction of the amendment may come up properly at a later moment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Has the point of order been made?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Kentucky gave notice of it.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that Australia paid an American line $400,000 a year for carrying their mails to the United States, that they then reduced it after two or three years—and the United States only paid about nine or ten thousand dollars for carrying the mails there—to $270,000; and that now they have taken it away from the line entirely because the United States would not give them a twentieth part of that subsidy, and they are employing now another line.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to another thing, that by reason of the connection direct between San Francisco and Australia our exports to Australia increased over four times in amount.

Mr. MCPHERSON. There may be some facts furnished of which I have not been informed, but I was of opinion that our trade with Australia must necessarily be very small and that we have adequate and abundant mail facilities already between San Francisco and Australia and that there was no particular necessity for this provision. I see the importance of this Government trying in some way to establish trade relations with the South American countries. We have been lying idle and dormant for years and years, while Great Britain, France, and Germany have gone into these various countries. To-day each one of these foreign powers is doing more business with the South American states, ten times more than we are; and while I insist upon it that our business with those states will never increase in proportion to what we expect it to do until such time as we make it possible for the raw products of those republics to come into the United States duty free or nearly so, at the same time we may make some progress. There are some things we make in this country that a market is ready for there. It costs us no more and less in fact to make cotton goods and cotton products here than it does in England. We have agricultural implements, we have a thousand things which the people of those republics want and will take.

The great natural outlet of this country is the Mississippi River, which nature has provided not only for an interchange of products among our own people but also for conveying products to the sea. I am told, and I believe correctly, that the cost of conveying a bushel of wheat, with the present appliances on that river, from Saint Louis to New Orleans is represented by the fraction of a cent. Less than a penny a bushel will convey to New Orleans the product of the great States on the Mississippi River and the tributaries which feed it. It costs to-day 10 or 15 cents to convey a bushel of wheat by rail from Saint Louis to the seashore at New York, when it can be conveyed down the river to New Orleans for less than a penny, and every mile you descend the river is a mile nearer the South American markets. Yet how little has been done to utilize it.

You are every day passing bills here to enable the Mississippi River to be bridged to accommodate railroads, and to-day each one of the bridges which span that stream carries more products across that river than float upon its bosom to the Gulf.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of the Senator why, if the grain of the West can be carried so cheaply on the Mississippi River from Saint Louis to New Orleans, it does not all go in that direction?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am told that under the system of floats and barges, moved very largely by the current of the river with but little power supplied, wheat can be conveyed for less than a cent a bushel. And yet it is not altogether strange that it does not go by river.

Mr. DAWES. I rose for the purpose, if I understood that statement correctly, to inquire of the Senator why it does not all go there?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Simply, I suppose, because there is no communication from New Orleans to any of the commercial ports of Great Britain. I suppose if you were to establish a line of steamships from there the cost would be very greatly reduced over the cost of steamship lines from New York to Liverpool. The difficulty now is owing to the impossibility of the shipment of a cargo from New Orleans.

Mr. DAWES. Why is that?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I know of no reason in the world except the reason I have given. The fact stands confronting us that they are carrying grain down the river to New Orleans for the price I have stated. The transportation bills show that the cost of transporting it from Saint Louis to New York is very much larger. At the port of New York are great steamship lines making their weekly trips across the ocean. They convey not only passengers but grain and other articles of merchandise. At the port of New York there is a return commerce. The ships return with full cargoes. I am told by people of the city of Boston, of which the Senator knows more than I, that one of the first-class steamship lines from the city of Boston had to stop because it was impossible to get return cargoes. I am told the same thing applies to Baltimore, and I am told the same thing exists in regard to Philadelphia.

Mr. DAWES. Why is that?

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is simply from the fact that trade is running in a certain direction. It will all come right in the course of time if facilities are given. Competition and low prices for our products abroad will eventually compel us to seek the very cheapest channels of transportation for our exports.

Mr. DAWES. If there was the same facility between New Orleans and the foreign market that there is between New York and the foreign market, if there was the same facility between Boston and the foreign market and between Philadelphia and Baltimore and the foreign market as there is with New York, there would be the same current of trade?

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the same facilities that are now afforded at the port of New York were afforded at New Orleans for the shipment of grain and the other products of the West directly to Liverpool it would cheapen the cost more than 10 cents per bushel on the average. In other words, it would give the producer of the West 10 cents more to meet the producer of India in the markets of Europe.

Mr. DAWES. That is just what I wanted to reach. I wanted to inquire what in the world is the objection to doing everything in our power to multiply these facilities at every point?

Mr. MCPHERSON. There is no objection to it, and as I said to the Senator I am in sympathy with this bill so far as it relates to our South American neighbors. If there are those who do not to-day and never have asked for the sympathy or charity of this Government, it is the people who reside west of the Mississippi River. They only ask for a market for their surplus products. To those people I say if they can open the markets of South America by the Mississippi to New Orleans, giving a short line of communication between New Orleans and the South American ports, it will be found of vast advantage to that Western country.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me to correct his figures, he states that wheat can be taken for a cent a bushel to New Orleans.

Mr. McPHERSON. That is my information.

Mr. TELLER. I find in the testimony taken by the Committee on Interstate Commerce that the president of a large company at Saint Louis, who is also president of the Chamber of Commerce, says that the rates to New York from Saint Louis are 13 cents a hundred on wheat and to New Orleans 7 cents, or about 4 cents a bushel. I should like to ask the Senator one question: He says the reason it does not go to New Orleans is because there is no return freight from New Orleans. I would like to inquire why there is no return freight from New Orleans?

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator misunderstands me. The question asked me was why the grain did not go to New Orleans to be exported abroad? I say to him that there are no steamship lines at New Orleans to take it. The question was asked why there are no steamship lines at New Orleans? I say in reply, because there is no return trade from the foreign ports, say from Liverpool to New Orleans, to enable a steamship company to carry grain as cheaply from New Orleans as from New York.

Mr. TELLER. Allow me to suggest that when a ship enters the port at New Orleans—and it is a good deal nearer the center of population in New Orleans than it is when it enters New York or Boston—it has a water way to the center of population of the United States which to-day under the last census is 22 miles west of the city of Cincinnati. There can be no reason except that we have not got ships on the ocean, why the supplies going to that great interior country should not come through the Mississippi River and by the city of New Orleans.

Mr. McPHERSON. The people of the Senator from Colorado for all their imports rely on New York. They come to the port of New York because all the financial arrangements are centered there; all the drafts payable there; the trade is running in that direction. It is well known to the Senator that when trade gets running in a certain channel for long periods of time it requires extraordinary facilities to take it from that channel.

Mr. TELLER. I would like to make one suggestion to the Senator. The reason that the people of Colorado do not go to New Orleans for their European intercourse is from the fact he has stated that there are no lines of shipping from there. We are as near to-day in fact to the city of New Orleans as we are to the city of Chicago—700 miles nearer the Atlantic Ocean there than we are at New York and still nearer than at Boston and other Eastern cities—and yet we are compelled to do all our business through the city of New York and other Eastern cities, because there is no line of ships from New Orleans, our national outlet, or the city of Galveston in Texas, which is another outlet of ours.

Mr. BROWN. I believe that is exactly what I stated.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me as though the true policy of the Western people and their interests are to do everything in their power to build up trade upon the great natural water courses of the country, and, having got their products to New Orleans, borne upon the bosom of the Mississippi River, their natural, their best market is to be found in the South American States.

For one I am ready to aid in bringing our people in direct communication with those countries, but I am not willing to hunt all over the map of the world to find some island in the sea to which we may establish postal relations, where by no possibility can they be of any advantage to our people and to our industry.

Mr. TELLER. I do not intend to make any speech on the tariff question at this time or perhaps at any other; but day before yesterday the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] assumed that the reason we did not trade with the South American republics was because we declined to take their produce, and he said that England did take their produce, and because England was ready to make a barter-trade she got the business. The Senator from New Jersey repeats that to-day, and repeats that in the face of the published reports of his own Government.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let me ask a question.

Mr. TELLER. I refer to the statement substantially made by the Senator from Kentucky, reiterated by the Senator from New Jersey, that the reason England gets the South American trade is that she engages in a barter-trade, and she takes their productions in exchange for hers. I say the statistics of his own Government, published and put upon his desk, will show that that is not true; the statistics of those individual states, the different republics of South America, and of Great Britain will show it is not true. To the Argentine Republic, spoken of here by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] the other day as a counterpart of our own, the British sent, as shown by the published statements of the British Government, more than five times as much as the Argentine Republic bought of them in the year 1884.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield there for a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let me present the point now in a forcible way, so that the Senator will understand it. Whatever the Senator from Kentucky may have said I am not responsible for. A cargo of merchandise, say cotton goods, if you please, leaves the port of New York—goods manufactured in an American factory, placed in an American ship, if you please, conveyed to Rio. At the same hour a cargo of cotton goods leaves Liverpool, conveyed in a British ship, and reaches Rio the same day. With the exception of the one article of coffee, which is admitted duty free into this country, tell me any of the products of any of the South American states for which that cotton can be exchanged on equal terms to the manufacturers in both countries? In other words, the American ship returns with the products of Brazil and is met at the custom-house with a demand for 45 per cent. duty upon its cargo before it goes to the factory. The cargo of the British ship returns to Liverpool and is entered there free; the English manufacturer pays no duty upon the raw material which makes the new product for the second ship-load of goods to be conveyed to the same port. How long, pray tell me, can an American manufacturer stand to pay these duties and still hope and expect to increase the area of the American market?

Mr. PLUMB. I want to ask the Senator a question right there. I ask what duties are there on the importation of corn? He talks about the burden of the tariff.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator's speech would be all very fine if it was based upon facts. I recollect reading many years ago that the great trouble in making a speech was that a man would be trammeled with facts. The Senator from New Jersey is not trammeled with facts at all; he rides right over them rough-shod.

I made the statement that the Argentine Republic bought of Great Britain five times as much as she sold and paid in cash the difference. Then the Senator turns around and tells me we would have bought of them too if it had not been that there was a tariff. There is no tariff on their silver; no tariff on their gold; no tariff on their hides, on horns, and on various other things of that kind that were admitted by the English; and the English sold them the identical goods that we manufactured in New Jersey, the very kinds of goods that have been stated on this floor, and it is not disputed that we excel the world in the manufacture of them. And the English goods of that kind shipped to South America were stamped as American goods; they stamp them with our stamp, as the Senator from Maine showed, for the purpose of forcing a sale. Why did they not buy of us? The fact is shown in the further statement in the official reports of this country that 31.6 per cent. of all the ships that entered the Argentine harbors, including her own, were ships bearing the British flag, and an inconsequential number of American ships, so small that they are not mentioned in the report either of that country or any other as having entered her ports.

Mr. President, take every other republic in South America save Chili and Peru, and the same thing is true in a more or less degree; they have been buying more from Great Britain than they have been selling to her, and we have been buying from the aggregate southern countries more than Great Britain. These are the facts and these are the figures that nobody can dispute; and yet the Senator from New Jersey tells us that it is because raw material is taxed here, and when I ask him to state what raw material he wants the tariff taken off of he declines to state, and says when the tariff bill comes here he will tell me. Sir, it is because our flag does not float, and it is because it is cheaper to-day to send goods from New York city to Liverpool and then to any South American city than it is to send them from New York, or from New Orleans, which is the natural port for all that country.

The honorable Senator stickles now over $800,000 for the purpose of initiating trade. Two years ago we voted $1,600,000 for the purpose of exhibiting ourselves to South American people in the Gulf State of Louisiana; $1,600,000 was there expended for the simple purpose of inviting those people to come here and form our acquaintance and make trade with us, and when it is proposed to put the results in a shape, then the Senator from New Jersey gets excited and talks about a subsidy. I know a subsidy is an odious term and has an odious meaning to a good many people, many are afraid of it, and I have never voted for a subsidy myself. I intend to vote for this proposition, and I intend to vote for all this class of subsidies, because, as has been said, the time has come when we must do this or we must lose the trade.

I have here before me the published report of the trade of Great Britain. I find that Brazil bought much more of Great Britain than she sold to Great Britain. I find that to be true of the Argentine Republic, of Mexico, of Colombia, of Uruguay, of Venezuela, of Hayti, of Ecuador, of Bolivia, and of all the countries south of us as I said before save and except the two countries of Chili and Peru, which are about equal, and in some of those ports four-fifths of all the ships that enter are British ships, and that is the key to it, and that is the explanation why we can not compete with Great Britain. It is not that they can sell a certain class of products cheaper than we, not that they are willing to take what we are not willing to take, but because we have not the opportunity of putting our goods there as they have of putting theirs.

Mr. President, no man who has studied trade will deny that a line of ships established to a country becomes an agency for all the merchants of that country. It is bound to make trade. Every man who has a dollar in it is forcing trade, and if the merchants do not put on the shore their factors and their agents the ship people will, and if the ship is not loaded by the people who are speculative the ship-owner loads it and sends it down there, because he must have the freight both ways if possible and he can afford to bring their products here, especially those products that are mentioned as not being subject to a tariff.

I hope nobody will give that any longer as a reason that England buys of the South American states what we refuse to buy, because it is not a fact borne out either by our own records or by the records of those countries or the records of Great Britain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I find in the Revised Statutes a general law, section 4007, authorizing the Postmaster-General, after advertisement for proposals, to enter into contracts for the transportation of the mail between the United States and any foreign country whenever the public interest will thereby be promoted. This section is a general authority to contract, after advertising, without limitation as to time. It may be for a trip, for a month, for a year, or for four years or more, but it is a broad authority to contract. I find that section 4009 provides—

> For transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign port or between the ports of the United States, touching at a foreign port, the Postmaster-General may allow as compensation, if by United States steamship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign steamship or by a sailing vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mails so transported.

Fixing the limits within which the Postmaster-General may allow compensation for the transportation of these mails. If this amendment shall be agreed to and become a law, it affects the general law on the subject by limiting the power and authority of the Postmaster-General to a given class of ships, to a fixed period not less than which he shall contract, and to a totally different rule of compensation.

If this amendment simply contained an appropriation for carrying the mails to the countries named in it, then the Postmaster-General under this general law as found in the Revised Statutes could advertise for proposals, and under the limitations of the Revised Statutes could enter into contracts for the carrying of these mails; but this amendment goes much further than a simple matter of appropriation for the carrying of the mails. It establishes a new rule as to compensation and fixes limitations upon the power of the Postmaster-General that do not exist under the general law. Therefore I raise the question of order that this amendment is general legislation upon a general appropriation bill; and the first two lines of clause 3 of Rule 16 provide that—

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

I raise that question of order.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to lines 69, 70, and 71 of the bill, which have probably escaped his attention, and to say to him that that provision, which has been incorporated, I think, in three several Post-Office appropriation bills, and to which an addition has already been made by a vote of the Senate, is an appropriation to give to the railroad companies a compensation other and different and in addition to that which is allowed by the general law, and I will ask him if the point of order would not equally lie against that provision?

Mr. HARRIS. I have not scrutinized the question suggested by the Senator from Kansas, nor does it affect the point that I raise whether the question of order would or would not lie in respect to the provision referred to by him. There is but one question to be determined in respect to this point of order. First it will not be denied that this is a general appropriation bill; the second and only remaining question for the Chair to determine is, is this general legislation? If the Chair will scrutinize the law as it is laid down in the Revised Statutes and scrutinize this amendment, the Chair is bound to perceive that it does limit and change the extent of the powers of the Postmaster-General as now prescribed under the Revised Statutes, and establishes a totally different rule in respect to the amount of compensation. It modifies, it changes the general law, and therefore it is unmistakably general legislation.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order being raised, the Chair will be glad to hear suggestions.

Mr. PLUMB. While it is true abstractly that the question whether some other provision is subject to a point of order does not touch the question whether the provision now objected to is subject to the point of order, there are a great many things that are comparative, and the general practice which has been observed by the Senate certainly would tend or might tend to throw some light upon what was or was not in order.

Now for the purpose of bringing specially to the attention of the Senator from Tennessee, and in order that he may be, as I know he desires to be, perfectly consistent on the question of keeping the bill clean of every feature of legislation, I ask him if he will not when the bill comes out of committee make the point of order on the provision in lines 69, 70, and 71, because I am bound to presume in this matter he is not moved by opposition to this paragraph of which he has spoken, that it is not the substance of it to which he objects, but it is the fact that it violates the rules of order of the Senate as he supposes, and for that reason and for that reason alone he interposes the objection.

Mr. HARRIS. May I inquire of the Senator from Kansas if the provision in lines 69, 70, and 71 is a provision in the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. We can make no question of order on the bill as it comes from the House. We can deal with provisions proposed in the Senate, but we can make no question of order on the bill as sent by the House.

Mr. PLUMB. What I refer to is the amendment proposed by the Senate committee to increase that item. If the original provision is legislation, then the amendment is equally legislation. The Senator will remember that question having been discussed in the Senate at the last session and it having been held that an amendment to a legislative provision was legislation as much as the original provision was.

Then I want to call attention to one other provision also, and that is the provision from lines 47 to 57 inclusive, which, while it was a provision also contained in the appropriation bill of last year, has been held, I believe, to have been not a continuing provision and consequently the necessity for the re-enactment of it, if the service between Tampa and Havana is to be carried on as a continuous service upon the basis upon which we carry on the coast-line mail service of the United States. If this bill is to be made clean, to use the language of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], let us not stop with a provision that we do not happen to like, but let us take it all as we come to it.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. If this amendment is agreed to, does it not modify and change the general law as it is found in the Revised Statutes?

Mr. FRYE. Temporarily.

Mr. PLUMB. It does provide another means to accomplish a certain result.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kansas will allow me to make a single statement in a single sentence?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. A change of a general pension bill is general legislation, making a rule for all pensions. A special pension bill which modifies that general rule in its application to a particular case is not general legislation; it is special legislation for a particular purpose, although it makes that particular case an exception to it, and so far a repeal of the general law. A provision to provide for a particular post-route, or to provide a particular mail service, as the fast-mail service from Boston to Florida, which we discussed a few days ago, is not general legislation, although the arrangement which it makes trenches upon general legislation for a special occasion.

Now this is precisely that case. The general law is left in force as to every case which shall come up in the future, except in regard to half a dozen specially enumerated routes, where we provide specially for a particular kind of contract. That is special legislation, and the importance of the thing does not make it any more general.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not design to discuss the question, except in a brief way. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the other provisions of this bill, which, as I think, are equally obnoxious to the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS. If there is any Senate amendment that is obnoxious to it, I make the point of order as to it.

Mr. PLUMB. I called his attention to it for the purpose of illustrating in the first place the position of those who do not think this is subject to the point of order, as exhibiting the practice of the Senate heretofore. Let me call his attention to one other matter which has recently passed with the concurrence of both Houses, and I suppose I may speak of that which has been heretofore acted on in the other House. That is a provision authorizing the employment of persons to examine into Indian claims under the Department of the Interior, making an appropriation of $10,000 for the purpose of doing that service, and directing how the Secretary of the Interior shall expend it. That is a matter which did not seem to have attracted the attention of the Senator from Tennessee or other Senators or any member of the other House. It is I think by means of illustrations of that kind that we can at least measurably determine what general legislation is within the legislative contemplation.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee, for the purpose of getting the scope of his objection, whether he does not think that the two paragraphs that I have brought to his attention are equally inimical to the point of order; and I ask that for the purpose of being informed more particularly in regard to his position, knowing that he is rightfully entitled to be considered an authority upon subjects of this kind.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not hesitate to answer on the question of order. The first clause to which the Senator calls my attention is simply changing the amount of the appropriation. I do not think that falls within the point of order.

Mr. PLUMB. But it was a legislative provision originally when it came to the Senate. That adds to the compensation.

Mr. HARRIS. That I do not know.

Mr. PLUMB. That adds to the compensation of railroads entitled under the general law——

Mr. HARRIS. We can make no question of order on the House bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that, but I am speaking of the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment simply changes it from one amount to more, adding slightly to the amount.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion on the point of order——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair, before stating his opinion, permit to be read the pending amendment, as it is very short?

Mr. PLUMB. As an illustration I will ask that all the amendments sent down to the Committee on Appropriations be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment reported by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as follows:

For compensation due the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company for carrying the United States mails during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, $36,000.

Mr. PLUMB. That was not to pay money due under existing law but under an equitable construction of the value of the service, which the Post-Office Committee thought proper.

Mr. HARRIS. When that question is presented to the Senate we shall see whether it is subject to a point of order or not.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment reported by Mr. FRYE from the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails: For transportation of foreign mails, including railway transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $1,000,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby directed to enter into contracts with American-built and registered steamships, whenever possible, for the transportation of any part of said foreign mails, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder, at a rate not to exceed 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points: Provided, That the aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed $600,000 of the sum hereby appropriated.

Also the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. EUSTIS, namely:

For special facilities and expedited mail from New York, via Washington; Lynchburg, Va.; Danville, Va.; Greensborough, N. C.; Charlotte, N. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Montgomery and Mobile, Ala., to New Orleans, $210,000.

Also the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CALL, namely:

That the appropriation for the fast mail service from Boston to Tampa, Fla., be increased to $291,725.

Mr. HOAR. All those would be struck down by this ruling.

Mr. FRYE. If the ruling is adverse.

Mr. HOAR. I mean by the point of order.

Mr. CALL. This is a question of the transportation of the mails to certain places. The Senator from Tennessee says that the general statutes that prohibit the Postmaster-General from applying certain amounts of money are violated or repealed for this purpose. That is the conclusion of the argument of the Senator; that is the effect of his argument.

The construction that he places by his argument on that statute is that a subsequent Congress is fettered in its discretionary power in appropriating for postal purposes. Now, there can be no such construction of the statutes of the United States because it is in contravention of the Constitution. It is never intended by any statute of the United States to limit the power of a succeeding Congress as to the amount it shall appropriate or the manner in which that appropriation shall be expended. It is not competent for any law of the United States thus to limit the power of appropriation in any subsequent Congress. Therefore, in my opinion, this amendment is not within the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS. I was certainly most unfortunate in stating my point of order when so able and intelligent a Senator as the Senator from Florida should have stated it as he has done. My point is precisely this, that under section 4006 the Postmaster-General is authorized and has the right to make a contract with any vessel, whether American or foreign, to carry mails to foreign countries, and that contract, if made under the Revised Statutes, may be for one trip, for one month, for one year, or for a number of years; but if this amendment is agreed to, then that provision of the Revised Statutes is changed, so that the Postmaster-General has no authority to make a contract for less than five years; therefore he would make a contract which would bind future Congresses, whether within or without their discretion, they would be compelled to make an appropriation to carry out the contract so made or repudiate it. Your argument turns upon yourself if there be anything in it.

This is changing the general law as to the authority of the Postmaster-General to make a contract. Then section 4009 prescribes the maximum limit of compensation that may be allowed American steamers or foreign steamers for carrying our mails to foreign ports. A totally different rule of compensation is fixed by this amendment; and again the general law is modified, if this shall be agreed to and become a law.

That this is general legislation, is as clear to my mind as that anything in the Revised Statutes is general legislation.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the proposition that I made does not seem to have been apprehended by the Senator from Tennessee. It is that the power of appropriation in each Congress is one that is unlimited as to the manner of its expenditure and the amount of its expenditure, that no law of a preceding Congress can say to this Congress in appropriating money which it is annually required to do for the public service the manner in which it shall be expended when made by this Congress or the amount which it shall expend. That is it.

The difference between the Senator and myself is not touched by his argument in that respect. If a preceding Congress should say to a succeeding one, "You shall not carry the mails in any other manner than as prescribed by this act; you shall not employ this, that, or the other agency," that would be saying to Congress, in the form of a law, that the power of Congress to appropriate money shall be limited. That is merely an authority given to the Postmaster-General to do a certain thing, and does not imply the exclusion of the power of Congress to do it in some other way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order made by the Senator from Tennessee, as the Chair understands, is that the amendment now proposed and pending is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRIS. On a general appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now pending will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment is in substance similar in principle at least to the amendment proposed to a naval appropriation on the 10th of April, 1884. The Chair finds that when that amendment was proposed and pending the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] raised the question of order that it was general legislation and not in order under the rules of the Senate. The Chair asks the Chief Clerk to read the decision of the President pro tempore [Mr. EDMUNDS] at the time.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the amendment is in order, for the reason that it is a provision like the provisions in all the appropriation bills for increasing the establishment the bill provides for, as an appropriation bill in respect of the Treasury Department provides for more clerks, provides for new furniture, and all things that relate to the subject of the bill and the execution of the purpose of the establishment. The Chair therefore feels obliged to rule that this amendment is not general legislation within the sense of the sixteenth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also finds that on the 23d of February, 1885, a proposition somewhat similar to this relating to the transportation of foreign mails was offered to the Post-Office appropriation bill of that year, and a point of order was raised by Mr. Bayard that the amendment proposed general legislation to an appropriation bill. The President pro tempore [Mr. EDMUNDS] submitted the question to the Senate whether the amendment was in order under the sixteenth rule. It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 20.

Even if the occupant of the chair had doubts upon the subject, he would feel bound to abide not only by the decision of the presiding officer but by that of the Senate.

The former presiding officer once decided it himself, and on one occasion submitted it to the Senate, and on each occasion the amendment was received, involving the same principle. On reading the rule the Chair is clearly of the opinion that this is not general legislation on an appropriation bill, for this reason: The rule of the Senate does not exclude all legislation on an appropriation bill. It does not prevent the Senate from limiting the terms of the appropriation or the purposes to which it shall be applied, or how it shall be conducted, or whether foreign service shall be on American ships, or English, or other ships; nor does it prohibit any qualification which may induce Congress to appropriate a larger or a smaller sum of money. Therefore a limitation that applies only to a particular item of appropriation and does not extend to the general law is not general legislation. The language of the rule seems to make it very clear:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received.

So that the rule plainly admits legislative provisions relevant to the proposition itself. The Chair is clearly, therefore, of opinion that it is within the power of the Senate under its rules to receive and consider the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I have great respect for the authority of the Chair, and I have great respect for the opinions of the presiding officer of this body; but so confident am I in the opinion that I have expressed that, being desirous to keep my own record clear on the question, I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An appeal being taken, the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? And the Senator from Massachusetts moves that the appeal lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SEWELL]. Not knowing how he would vote, I decline to vote.

Mr. PLUMB (when Mr. SEWELL'S name was called). The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], but understanding that he would vote to lay on the table, I have voted "yea."

I desire also to say that my colleague [Mr. COLQUITT] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote. I had forgotten at the time that I was paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL], who is detained from the Senate by sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 17; as follows:

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid upon the table.

Mr. PLUMB. It is suggested that the convenience of several Senators would be subserved by having an executive session. I have no preference about that matter. I wish to say further that I am asked by a number of Senators not to interpose objection to an adjournment over until Monday; and so far as I am concerned, while I very much prefer to sit to-morrow, I do not want to be understood as in any way pressing this bill against the opinion of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will insist on an adjournment until to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMB. As far as I am concerned personally I am willing to sit to-morrow and get a vote on the bill. I ask unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock to-morrow debate shall cease on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent of the Senate that at 4 o'clock to-morrow the vote shall be taken on the pending proposition.

Mr. CONGER. That is at 4 o'clock on the next legislative day?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; 4 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. That is asking us to assume without discussion that we are going to sit to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMB. Say the next legislative day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas modifies his proposition so that the vote shall be taken at 4 o'clock on the next legislative day.

Mr. PLUMB. That is, that general debate shall cease at 4 o'clock on the next legislative day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, that will be considered the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion to go into executive session, the Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 18——

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays. It is a simple question of wasting one day.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand Senators desire only a short executive session.

Mr. MAXEY. That is what I moved—an executive session. There are reasons for having one to-night for a few minutes. There ought to be one, and I have moved an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are ordered on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not want to sail under false colors. I give notice that if this motion is voted down, I shall move to adjourn to Monday, because I want to adjourn to Monday myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the real point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are ordered on the motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. BUTLER. It is very likely my friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] would vote to adjourn, and I should vote against it. I announce my pair with him.

Mr. HARRISON. I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—12.

Allison,	Dawes,	Hale,	Platt,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	Teller,
Cullom,	Frye,	Morrill,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—33.

Beck,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Berry,	George,	Maxey,	Vance,
Brown,	Gorman,	Miller,	Vest,
Call,	Gray,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Walthall,
Camden,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Whitthorne,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Palmer,	Wilson of Md.
Coke,	Hawley,	Payne,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Eustis,	McPherson,	Ransom,

ABSENT—31.

Aldrich,	Fair,	Logan,	Saulsbury,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Butler,	Hearst,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sherman,
Cameron,	Jones of Arkansas,	Pike,	Stanford,
Chace,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,	Van Wyck,
Colquitt,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,	Voorhees.
Dolph,	Kenna,	Sabin,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator from Texas to withdraw that motion for a moment. I simply want to move an adjournment until Monday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have a right to make that motion pending a motion for an executive session.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that when the Senate adjourn it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HOAR. Is that in order when a motion to go into executive session is pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is clearly in order under the rule. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate adjourn until Monday.

Mr. HARRIS. No; that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet on Monday.

Mr. BUTLER. I confess I do not know the difference. My motion is that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Either is in order. A motion to adjourn to Monday is in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order and takes precedence. The Senator from South Carolina moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. The question is on that motion.

Mr. HOAR. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I announce again my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Texas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. CALL. I ask leave to present certain papers from citizens of the State of Florida concerning the public lands of the United States in that State. I move their reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 30, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS IMPROVEMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting report of judgments against the United States for flowage damages caused by improvements on Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations; and ordered to be printed.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department of the United States, reported from the Senate with the following amendment.

Page 66, after line 17, insert:

"MISSISSIPPI.

"To Catharine C. B. Merrill, executrix of the last will and testament of Ayres P. Merrill, late of said State, $67,726."

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two House.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. GEDDES, and Mr. JOHNSTON of Indiana.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill of the Senate of the following title; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, namely:

A bill (S. 1908) to amend section 4004 of the Revised Statutes, providing for additional pay for postal cars.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WEST, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, for one week.

BORDEAUX INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a dispatch from the American minister at Paris, inclosing a letter from the president of the Philomathical Society of Bordeaux relative to the congress for the discussion of technical, commercial, and industrial education to be held at Bordeaux; also transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Labor, recommending that the United States be represented in said congress; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CLAIMS FOR REBATE OF TONNAGE TAX.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting copies of correspondence relative to the claim of the French Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, growing out of alleged illegal tonnage tax; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BEACH. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed with the regular order.

This being Friday, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports upon bills of a private nature.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to dispense with all private business for to-day.

Mr. OATES. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. MATSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MATSON. Will that motion, if adopted, dispense with the private business fixed for this evening?

The SPEAKER. It will not. That business is transacted under another special order of the House, and will not be affected by this motion.

The question being taken on the adoption of Mr. WILLIS's motion, there were on a division—ayes 69, noes 59.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Does not that require a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FELTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. WILLIS were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 69.

So the motion to dispense with private business was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, FORT WAYNE, IND.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House, under the rule, a House bill with Senate amendments, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3775) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase an additional strip of ground on the east side of the United States court-house and post-office building at Fort Wayne, Ind., to be paid for out of the appropriation already made.

Mr. LOWRY. I ask unanimous consent for present consideration of the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the Senate, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 29, 1886.

Resolved, That this bill pass with the following amendment:

"Provided further, That no money shall be paid out of the Treasury on account of said purchase, until the Attorney-General of the United States shall certify that the title to said land is complete in the United States."

Mr. LOWRY. I ask one minute to explain this amendment, so as to obtain consent of the House for immediate action and concurrence in it.

This is simply a pro forma amendment, and is already provided for by the statute in my opinion. It simply provides an additional safeguard, that the ground shall not be paid for until the Attorney-General shall report that the title is complete in the United States. While the amendment is not necessary there is no objection to it, and I ask unanimous consent for immediate action upon the amendment with a view to concurrence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. LOWRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a vote of two-thirds.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 73, noes 29.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, as the House has determined by a decided vote to give to the River and Harbor Committee the balance of this day, and as the committee I represent is next upon the regular call, I ask unanimous consent that the second call of committees may be dispensed with also for to-day. I shall make no objection to it myself.

Mr. WILKINS. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Can this not be done by a vote of the House?

The SPEAKER. It can not; there is no provision in the rule for dispensing with the second call.

SOUTH PASS OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors was called.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to call up and ask the passage at this time of the bill (H. R. 7207) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1886, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at South Pass of Mississippi River.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sum be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to wit:

To supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1886, for examinations and surveys required by the act of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain the depth of water and width of channel secured and maintained from time to time by James B. Eads at South Pass of the Mississippi River, and to enable the Secretary of War to report to Congress during the maintenance of the work, $6,492.

SEC. 2. That the money hereby appropriated shall be immediately available.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FELTON. I object.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair, and proceeded to consider the bill H. R. 7207.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read the report; as showing the necessity for the passage of this bill. Let the first page of the report be read.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. BLANCHARD), as follows:

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors beg leave to report to the House the accompanying bill "making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1886, for examinations and surveys required by the acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at the South Pass of the Mississippi River."

In support of this recommendation your committee represent that the aforesaid acts of Congress of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, impose upon the Secretary of War the performance of certain duties annually, in connection with the contract entered into by the Government of the United States with James B. Eads, for the securing and maintaining of a certain depth of water and width of channel at the South Pass of the Mississippi River, which said duties are in the nature of examinations and surveys to ascertain the results obtained and maintained by said Eads in the works at said pass under the obligations assumed by him to the Government in the aforesaid contract.

These examinations and surveys are also needed to enable the Government to fulfill its obligations of compensation and payment to said Eads, under the terms of said acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, as well as to enable the Secretary of War to report to Congress during the maintenance of said works, as required by said acts, to the end that Congress "may be kept fully advised as to the faithfulness and efficiency with which the said works are being executed by said Eads and associates." The appropriation of $6,492, provided for in the bill, is to meet the expense of the surveys and examinations aforesaid, until the end of the present fiscal year, June 30, 1886, and is asked for in the deficiency estimates of appropriation, submitted during this session, by the Department of War, as well as made the subject of special communications in writing by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers.

Appropriation for the object covered by the bill has heretofore always been made in the river and harbor bill, and was provided for in the river and harbor bill which was reported to the House during the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, but, by failure of that bill to become a law, the same was lost. No appropriation, therefore, for the purpose mentioned in the bill herewith submitted, was made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and hence the deficiency, to meet which is the object of the present bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is all I desire to have read. I now ask the Clerk to read a communication from the Secretary of War, dated March 31, touching this matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 31, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to again invite attention to the estimate for "Examinations and surveys at South Pass, Mississippi River."

The engineer officer in charge of the examinations and surveys at South Pass, Mississippi River, has, under date of March 26, 1886, submitted his quarterly certificate of maintenance of the jetty channel. From this certificate it appears that the channel near to and between the sea ends of the jetties was not of the required dimensions for seventeen days during the quarter.

The acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, require the Secretary of War to make the examinations and surveys in order that it may be ascertained that the required dimensions of the channel are maintained, and but for the voluntary services of the assistant engineer and employés since December 1, 1885, it would have been impossible to have discovered that the channel was deficient, which would have been a loss to the Government of over $6,000, nearly the amount required for their seven months' services.

In view of the very great importance of the work, I urgently recommend the immediate passage of House bill No. 7207.

Very respectfully,

WM. C. ENDICOTT, Secretary of War.

Hon. A. S. WILLIS,
Chairman of Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, the report which has been read and the letter of the Secretary of War fully explain the necessity existing for the passage of this small bill. It only carries an appropriation of $6,000, which is needed to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the duties imposed upon him by existing laws.

Mr. WILSON. How much?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Six thousand four hundred and ninety-two dollars. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Before the question is put upon that motion I should like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana whether the engineers have reported upon the depth of channel that has been maintained under the law or the contract with Mr. Eads?

Mr. BLANCHARD. They have; and I will state to my friend from Ohio that the parties down there engaged in that work have been doing it voluntarily without pay since the 1st of December by reason of the failure of this small appropriation in the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I thought the examinations were made by officers of the Army of the Engineer Corps.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The examination is made under the supervision and direction of Captain Heuer, an officer of the United States

Army in the Engineer Corps; but he has to have assistants to make this examination, and it is to pay them this appropriation is needed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the report show the required depth of the channel throughout?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The report is made monthly by Captain Heuer, the Army engineer in charge there, and shows the depth of water every day maintained at the South Pass.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If this is an appropriation in accordance with existing law why does it not come from the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The appropriation has always heretofore been made in the river and harbor bill, but by reason of the failure of the river and harbor bill in the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress no appropriation was made.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Is there one in the present river and harbor bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. There is for the fiscal year commencing the 1st of July next. I now submit my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. If the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule is not demanded, the Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana. The gentleman moves that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7207) making appropriation to supply deficiency in amount required for expenditure to June 30, 1886, for examination and surveys required by acts of March 3, 1875, and June 19, 1878, to ascertain depth of water and width of channel at South Pass of Mississippi River, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLANCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

The Committee on Agriculture was called.

Mr. HATCH. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to call up for consideration the resolution, with an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, the 27th day of April, 1886, after the second call of committees, be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on Agriculture, this order not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills, and, whether so interfered with on that day or not, shall be a continuing order until the bills presented by said committee shall be disposed of.

Mr. HATCH. On behalf of the committee I offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out "Tuesday, the 27th day of April," and inserting in lieu thereof "Thursday, the 13th day of May."

Mr. HATCH. I desire to state for the information of the House that it is the purpose of the committee under that resolution to ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7208) to amend an act entitled "An act for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for other purposes," approved May 29, 1884; the bill (H. R. 2933) to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto; the bill (H. R. 2293) to promote agriculture, and for other purposes; and the bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine. And upon the resolution and amendment I demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRISON. One of the bills the gentleman includes in his resolution to be considered by special order or assignment is a revenue bill and privileged whenever a majority of the House see fit to enter upon its consideration. I suggest to the gentleman that bill ought to be left to take its place with other revenue bills—I mean the bill in reference to oleomargarine or artificial butter.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] propose to exclude the consideration of the tariff bill?

Mr. HATCH. The resolution itself does not specify the bills, but in fairness to the House and in obedience to the instructions of the committee I have stated frankly the bills that we now have upon the Calendar which we desire to have considered under this resolution. The point made by the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MORRISON. It is not a point; it is a mere suggestion to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HATCH. Well, the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] will not, I am afraid, fully cover the consideration of this bill, for the reason that while it is a revenue bill, and under the rules of the House belongs to the Committee of Ways and Means, it was referred by a special order of the House to the Committee on Agriculture; and whether that reference carries with it all the rights of a revenue bill I think extremely doubtful. Therefore, as a matter of precaution, I have mentioned it among the bills that we shall ask to have considered under this resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. I will inquire of the gentleman whether this resolution contains the usual exception in favor of revenue and appropriation bills?

Mr. HATCH. It does.

A MEMBER. Does it except prior orders?

Mr. HATCH. It does not.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] does not desire any amendments to this bill touching other internal-revenue taxes?

Mr. HATCH. The position taken by the Committee on Agriculture and the position that I shall take before the House is that, this being a special authority and a limited jurisdiction conferred upon the Committee on Agriculture, the bill reported by that committee is not subject to amendments as far as other matters taxable under the internal-revenue system are concerned Therefore we propose to confine the amendments to such subjects as pertain alone to the subject-matter of the bill, and will not, with our consent, permit any amendments to be put upon the bill relating to tobacco, spirits, or anything of that kind now subject to taxation under the internal-revenue system. I demand the previous question upon the amendment and the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] whether his resolution excepts prior orders?

Mr. HATCH. It does not.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I hope the House will vote it down.

Mr. HATCH. We have taken a day that is not occupied, and we have asked the consideration of this bill, and——

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman says he has taken a day that is not occupied; I would like to ask the gentleman how he can take a day that is not occupied, when the business of this House may be pushed on, and other committees having bills that they desire to pass may occupy the very day the gentleman has selected unless he gets his resolution through in the shape he proposes, taking that day regardless of prior orders.

Mr. HATCH. That is in the discretion of the House. When that day arrives, if more than one special order asks for recognition, it is for the majority of the House to determine the question.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is now in the discretion of the House, submitted to it by the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], and I trust the House will exercise its discretion and vote the resolution down.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable. The gentleman has demanded the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for a division.

While the House was proceeding to divide,

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand for a division at this time. I prefer to take it on the main question.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the resolution read again.

The resolution was again read.

The amendment, substituting in the resolution the 13th day of May for the 27th day of April, was agreed to

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 129, noes 16.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POWERS OF THE AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HATCH. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 5190) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House. I will state to the House that this has been done without objection in the last two Congresses when this bill has come up for consideration.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to have the bill read before this question is decided.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5190) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Department of Agriculture, established at the seat of Government of the United States, shall be an Executive Department, to be known as the department of agriculture and labor, under the supervision and control of a secretary of agriculture and labor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include such department, and the provisions of title 4 of the Revised Statutes are hereby made applicable to said department.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in said department an assistant secretary of agriculture and labor, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the secretary.

SEC. 3. That the secretary of agriculture and labor shall hereafter receive the same salary as is paid to the Secretary of each of the Executive Departments, and the salary of the assistant secretary of agriculture and labor shall be the same as that now paid to the Assistant Secretary of the Department of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws relating to the Department of Agriculture now in existence, as far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, and only so far, are continued in full force and effect.

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the department of agriculture and labor a division which shall be under the charge of a commissioner of labor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The commissioner of labor shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor shall be appointed, unless sooner removed, and shall receive a salary of $4,000 a year. The commissioner shall collect information upon the subject of labor, its relation to capital, the hours of labor, the earnings of laboring men and women, the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity, and the best means to protect life and prevent accident in mines, workshops, factories, and other places of industry. The secretary, upon recommendation of said commissioner shall appoint a chief clerk, who shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, and such other employés as may be necessary for said division. The commissioner shall annually make a report in writing to the secretary of agriculture and labor of the information collected and collated by him, and containing such recommendations as he may deem calculated to promote the efficiency of the division. The secretary of agriculture and labor shall be empowered to inquire into the causes of discontent which may exist between employers and employés within the United States, and he may invite and hear sworn statements from both such parties concerning the matters in controversy. The secretary shall make a report annually to Congress upon the condition of labor in the United States, accompanied by such recommendations as he may deem important; and said reports, with accompanying documents, shall be printed and bound in a volume separate and apart from the reports on agriculture.

SEC. 6. That the act approved June 27, 1884, establishing a bureau of labor, is hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] asks unanimous consent that the Committe of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be considered in the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, is the five-minute debate thereby cut off, and does it render the call of the previous question possible?

The SPEAKER. It would not prevent the House from ordering the previous question, the effect of which would be to cut off all debate and all amendments.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Then I object to the proposition.

Mr. HATCH. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I will yield to him or any other gentleman such time as he may need.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the bill had better be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HATCH. What gentleman objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. HATCH. Let the gentleman from Texas take the responsibility.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has taken the responsibility.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the gentleman from Texas to withdraw his objection. He supported a bill similar to this in the Forty-eighth Congress. I will yield him such time as he desires.

Mr. HEWITT. I would like to share the responsibility of objecting.

Mr. REAGAN. This is a very important bill and deserves the fullest consideration.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5190) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill having been read in the House, it will not be read again unless some gentleman requests it.

Mr. HATCH. I ask for the reading of the report as a part of my remarks.

The report (by Mr. HATCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2932), entitled "A bill to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture," unanimously report the accompanying bill as a substitute therefor, and recommend its favorable consideration and passage by the House.

Substantially the same propositions embodied in the first four sections of this bill, except the addition of the words "and labor," have been before the House for its consideration and action in the past three Congresses.

In the third session of the Forty-sixth Congress, February 7, 1881, Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, moved to suspend the rules and pass House bill 4909, on which motion the yeas were 164, nays 83, not voting 45, failing, by 1 vote, to receive the necessary two-thirds.

Again, in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress House bill 4429 was reported to the House by Mr. ANDERSON from the Committee on Agriculture, made a special order, and after full consideration and discussion, on May 10, 1882, passed the House by the overwhelming vote of yeas 183, nays 7, not voting 110.

And again in the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, December 15, 1884, Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, moved to suspend the rules and pass House bill 1457, which, after discussion under the rule, passed the House by the decisive vote of yeas 166, nays 69, not voting 88.

This repeated action of the House clearly demonstrates the position of the representatives of the people upon this important measure. This bill was sent to the Senate, and on February 7, 1885, reported to the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, with amendments, but was never reached for consideration and final action.

Section 5 was proposed as an additional one by the Committee on Labor, and, as your committee are informed, unanimously approved by said committee and adopted by the Committee on Agriculture with substantial unanimity. The adoption of section 5 necessitated the changes in the preceding sections already suggested in the first paragraph of their report.

Your committee cordially approve the transfer of the Bureau of Labor from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture, and the incorporation of these great industries into one name, as they are in interest, to be henceforth known as the "Department of Agriculture and Labor."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting general debate on this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will not press that motion. I would like to submit a few observations.

Mr. HATCH. I will yield a fair proportion of time to the gentleman. I have already appealed to him. I now insist on my motion. I want general debate limited so that we may get a vote on this bill within the hour.

Mr. REAGAN addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is not debatable.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. Is the motion that the committee rise in order until there has been debate?

Mr. HATCH. There has been debate.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. There has been no debate.

Mr. HATCH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I called for the reading of the report in my time, and as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The bill has not been read in the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to move to limit debate under the five-minute rule unless such debate has been had; but general debate having already taken place on this bill, a motion to limit such debate would be in order in the House.

Mr. HATCH. I insist on my motion.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HATCH that the committee rise,

The CHAIRMAN said: In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a division demanded? [A pause.] If not, the motion that the committee rise is agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole has not yet made his report.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to make a question of order. I demanded a division immediately upon the announcement of the vote, and before the declaration of the result.

The SPEAKER. That was a proceeding in Committee of the Whole with which the present occupant of the chair has nothing to do.

Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5190) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture, had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER having stated the report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. SPRINGER said: I desire to make a statement. As occupant of the chair in Committee of the Whole I heard the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] make some remark in regard to the bill. I paused and asked whether a division was demanded and looked toward the gentleman from Texas, but the gentleman resumed his seat and made no statement. Therefore I declared the motion carried. I beg pardon of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of House bill 5190; and pending that motion I move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on this bill be limited to one hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend that motion by striking out "one hour" and inserting "two hours."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. REAGAN, there were—ayes 37, noes 95.

Mr. REAGAN. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HATCH and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

Mr. REAGAN (before the count by tellers had been made). I withdraw the point that no quorum voted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I renew it.

Tellers were again ordered; and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, and Mr. HATCH were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 3, noes 109.

Mr. HATCH. To save time on this question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 186, not voting 110; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. HOPKINS said: Mr. Speaker, I ask to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman within the bar of the House when his name was called?

Mr. HOPKINS. I was not until afterward.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman is excluded by the rule.

Mr. HOPKINS. If present, I would have voted "no."

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HAMMOND] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. WILLIS moved by unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. MILLS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question coming over from yesterday is the amendment of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to add what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Also, $25,000 for work on the river at Hickman and $25,000 for work on the river at Columbus, Ky.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question next recurs upon the following amendment moved by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NEECE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 1101 the following:

"The sum of $15,000 shall be used in strengthening the levees on the east side of the Mississippi River, between Warsaw and Quincy, Ill."

Mr. WILLIS. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. It is that we have passed that part of the bill and the gentleman's amendment is not germane to this part of the bill.

Mr. NEECE. I withdraw the amendment for the present, giving notice I shall offer it hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question next recurs on the following amendment offered in pursuance of the understanding of last evening by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

First. Strike out the words "Mississippi River Commission" and "commission," wherever they occur in the paragraph on pages 47 and 48 of the bill, and insert "Secretary of War."

Second. At the end of line 1152 add: "Provided, That a committee, to consist of five members of the House, shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the work of the Mississippi River Commission and to report thereon before the end of the session, with such recommendation as it may deem proper. Said committee shall also examine and report upon the jetties at the mouth of the river, and especially whether mud lumps are forming beyond the jetties and what depth of channel is kept open at and beyond the mouth of the river."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, if this work is to go on I think it should go on as other works appropriated for in this bill are carried on, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

As to the second amendment, we have expended already over $8,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River under the plan known as the Eads plan and under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission. It is admitted, I believe, that it will take at least $100,000,000 to complete the work under that plan.

Mr. DUNN. Who admits that?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It has been often so stated. And I will state, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt——

Mr. DUNN. It has not been admitted by anybody who knows anything about it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It will take more than $100,000,000.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Ohio is entirely mistaken in that statement.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That plan includes not only the navigation of the river, which relates to low-water stages, but the construction of levees almost the entire length of the river, or its entire length except where the bluffs extend.

Now, the report of the commission itself shows that it has taken a great deal to keep these works in order; it shows that the losses on these works have been enormous; that the cost of maintaining them has amounted to over 24 per cent. from the beginning up to July, 1885; and the recent losses are greater than the losses of the four years preceding; so that I take it there has been a loss of from 33⅓ to 50 per cent. already on these works, which means that it has taken, or will take, about this proportion of the original cost to make good loss and damage.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman is very much mistaken in that statement.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I refer to the report of the commission itself, on page 2868 for the year 1885—the Mississippi River Commission—in support of the statement, and that does not include the recent losses, which are very great in extent.

At any rate it can not be expected that it will take less than from 10 to 20 per cent. per annum to maintain them after they are constructed.

But the point I come to, Mr. Chairman, is this: In view of the enormous original cost of these works, and of the ultimate enormous cost to follow for maintenance, and also in view of the fact that the great losses which have occurred in the last year ought to be inquired into—the floods having swept away, according to reports, not only the works along the banks, but carrying away the banks themselves containing the levees—before we go further and make additional large appropriations I think we should know more of the character of the works than we now know, and that there should be an investigation by a committee of Congress, which should go there and make a personal inspection of all the works and ascertain what is being done and what the condition of the works now is. I am not willing to take the report of the Mississippi River Commission as a guide without question. For one, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in the plan itself. I would willingly vote to appropriate the money if it was necessary for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, or if it would surely prevent overflow, if it would contain within the levees permanently the flood waters of the Mississippi River; but I do not believe it will have that effect.

My own belief is that after the expenditure of $100,000,000 the river will be in a worse condition than now. For that reason I shall vote to strike out this provision of the bill. At any rate, I think we should have very much better information than we now have, and for this reason I have offered the amendment proposing the creation of this committee—not a junketing committee, but a working committee—to make its report before this Congress adjourns.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, of course we are to have re-enacted and repeated here the old routine which has been gone through with every time the section for the improvement of the Mississippi River in the river and harbor bill is reached for the last six years.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] says that he does not believe in the plan of the commission. Why, we all knew that before. He never did believe in it; he has always voted against it. But Congress formally, deliberately adopted that plan; Congress ordered and authorized it. The fourth section of the act of June 28, 1879, says:

> It shall be the duty of the Mississippi River Commission to take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel, protect the banks of the river, improve and give ease and safety to navigation, prevent destructive floods, and promote and facilitate commerce.

That plan has been regularly, steadily, and uniformly adhered to by the commission with all the means that Congress has placed at their disposal. The gentleman from Ohio and those who have acted with him heretofore have insisted that the appropriations made shall be small in amount, and through their influence the appropriations have been kept far below what the commission asked for; and then, after hampering and hamstringing and crippling the commission with insufficient appropriations, the gentlemen now come and say that a large per cent. of the money has been expended to preserve and protect incomplete works which they themselves have denied the means of completing. We all know that this niggardly, insufficient, ill-advised, and parsimonious method of appropriating for public works, whether public rivers and harbors or public buildings, has cost the Government of the United States a large percentage of the appropriations made, because it had to be used to protect the work already partly constructed or finished. The commission has done all in its power to do with the means placed at its disposal; and the report not only of the commission but those of the three committees of Congress that have been sent there to inspect the works have all been favorable to the plan.

The gentleman from Ohio now asks for another commission. There have been three already appointed. The Forty-sixth Congress appointed one which made a formal report on the subject after a careful and deliberate examination.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But there has been none since.

Mr. DUNN. Yes, sir; there have been committees since. The Senate appointed one since, of which [Mr. LOGAN] was chairman. This House appointed one since, of which I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] was chairman. My distinguished friend from Indiana here [Mr. HOLMAN] was on that committee, and the distinguished Speaker of this House, with other prominent members. They went down and inspected this work in which the whole people of the country are interested.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think that investigation was in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. DUNN. The committee was appointed by the Forty-seventh Congress. Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, was the chairman.

There have been three deliberate investigations, and three favorable reports by committees, and they all took in the jetties, all except the first one, that of the Forty-sixth Congress, that was not charged with inspecting the jetties. But they took in and carefully inspected this plan of improvement, and the commission report the work is successful wherever completed and protected.

Mr. BLANCHARD was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. DUNN.

Mr. DUNN. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for his courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we shall never be able to satisfy the gentlemen who have been fighting this plan for four years. They fought the whole plan to begin with. After they found they could not defeat it, and that the Mississippi River was large enough and old enough and great enough to assert itself in this House and make its importance felt in Congress, then they set about to cut off the levee part of the improvement. They said that was for protection.

I would like to ask my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. REED], whom I do not now see in his seat, and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], and other gentlemen on that side, all of whom have had their souls so troubled with the levees—I would like to ask them this question: When you come to lay a plan of taxation do you lay that plan which will yield the most revenue only or that which will give protection with it? My distinguished friend from the salt district of New York, when he lays taxes to collect revenue for the Government, always takes care that the salt is protected.

My friend from Maine takes care that the manufacturing industries of the country are protected. As Mr. Banks said some years ago, "When you levee a stream you do not levee up to the top of the water merely, but you go high enough to keep the water out." So he would levy taxation for protection high enough to keep out competition. Do you adopt that plan of taxation which is most for the general interest or that which will do the least good?

Now, if we have two plans for improving this river, one of which will simply benefit navigation a little, and another of which will make a complete and perfect system of navigation and give the superadded benefit of protection to twenty-five millions of acres of the richest and most fertile and productive land on this earth, which of the two will you choose? That which will do the most good is the choice of all statesmen. You over there strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Our plan provides the means of raising money and yours the means of spending it.

Mr. DUNN. Your protective system does not raise money. It keeps out goods and gives protection alone. Everybody knows that the revenue is not collected on protected articles, but on things generally that are not protected. But you swallow a camel in the shape of that species of protection and strain at this little gnat of the Mississippi River.

A MEMBER. A very big gnat.

Mr. DUNN. The plan of the Mississippi River improvement is asserted by every man who has studied it to be a perfect and complete system. But it would be incomplete without all the parts of the plan. And when you demand success of the plan of the commission, if you strike down half the plan and allow them to use only a part of it what success can you expect? No one can undertake in a debate under the five-minute rule to explain that plan in detail. But all who have studied it have received from that study satisfactory evidence of its correctness and of its utility and practicability. The work of the commission, wherever it has been in any measure fairly well perfected, has given complete satisfaction and proved a success. Gentlemen on this floor have repeatedly told you—they told you yesterday of the results obtained at Horse-tail bar, where there used to be only 4½ feet of water and where now there are 9 feet; and at Plum Point, where instead of 6 feet of water there are to-day 12.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] says we swallow a camel and strain at a gnat. I would like to point the gentleman to the fact that the camel we have swallowed in the last twenty-five years has inflated this country with a prosperity it never before had, a prosperity unparalleled in the history of nations.

Mr. DUNN. Suppose you try the gnat and see what that will do.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will tell the gentleman why not. It is because that gnat contains within him a principle which we believe will eat out the country's substance.

I desire to say I am not here for the purpose of opposing the improvement of the great water ways of the country. Not at all. I am not here to oppose internal improvements. I favor them. And when the gentleman will show me that the moneys to be expended can be so applied as to bring back to the people such advantages as will make the improvement a good investment he certainly will have my vote for the appropriations.

But there is a question, Mr. Chairman, as to where this thing is going to end. I have never known a river and harbor bill to be a bill for the protection of railroads. I never have supposed that was its purpose. I know in the last Congress a gentleman introduced a bill to improve a river for the purposes of navigation, and when it was shown not only that that river had not been navigated but that it could not be, the explanation given of its benefit to commerce was that the logs run down that river were ultimately made into vessels; that the river was full of rocks; that the logs in consequence wore out before they got to the mouth of the river; and the gentleman who had charge of the proposition wanted the rocks removed so that the logs could be floated down and built into vessels, and claimed that in that way his bill was in the interest of navigation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I see in the report of the engineer (page 2848 of this document) that there is $158,600 to be appropriated for Carrollton Bend on the left bank; for Gouldsborough, $64,200; for Gretna Bend, on the right bank, $64,200; for bend above Gretna to a point nearly opposite the city park on the right bank, $396,600; making a total of $683,600.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Not appropriated; estimated.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Estimated. Now let us see what this money is for. With regard to Carrollton Bend, it is stated here that "there are no wharves, and the improvement would be of little value to commerce and navigation at present."

Mr. BLANCHARD. There is no improvement being made there.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Very well. Now let us look at Gouldsborough and Gretna, opposite New Orleans.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Part of the city.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Part of the city. I read:

On November 19, 1883, in accordance with your order, I obtained the following information regarding the caving of the banks, values of property, interests on the river front in Gouldsborough and Gretna. The bank along some parts of this front is caving badly. It is occupied for railroad termini, transfer facilities, warehouses, and similar constructions. These are all used for purposes of commerce and navigation. They can not safely be used unless the bank is protected. The value of property on this front is estimated to be $1,400,000.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that the proposition to make this appropriation is a proposition to protect the private property of individuals and the property of railroad companies. I would not object to it, perhaps, if this were the only instance——

Mr. DINGLEY was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. MILLIKEN.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The objection that I make to it is that it is starting out upon a policy that may have no end. If you are going to protect private property on the banks of the Mississippi River in this manner, if you are going to build wharves for those people, why should you not do the same for every port on the Atlantic? There are harbors on the Atlantic coast of no considerable size where there is at times great injury done by storms. I live upon, perhaps, as beautiful a bay as there is in the world, as good a harbor as there is on the globe, and yet there have been times in the course of the last twenty-five years when I have had to go down with others in the night-time to take vessels away from the wharves and moor them out in the harbor, in order to protect them from breaking to pieces; and I have gone down the next day after a storm and seen wharves that were worth from $5,000 to $10,000 absolutely destroyed.

There is no harbor on the Atlantic, unless it be some small cove, where the wharves are entirely safe during the great storms that occasionally occur. Now, would gentlemen say that the Government of the United States should come in and rebuild those wharves? Why, I remember the case of one poor fellow who lost his wharf, which was all the property he had, and we subscribed some $5,000 to help him and he rebuilt his wharf; but if the Government is to protect wharf property, or the property on which these warehouses are situated and where this railroad terminus is on the bank of the Mississippi, why should it not in like manner protect every wharf and every harbor on the Atlantic coast? I can see no reason in the one case that does not apply in the other; and I predict, gentlemen, that if you start out upon this policy you will find the owners of every piece of private property in the country where the slightest excuse can be found coming in here and asking the Government to protect their property from the ravages of the waters, or the winds, or the rains, or the fire, or some other element of destruction.

Mr. DUNN. I do not know that there is an item in this bill for any such purpose as that. I have never heard of any appropriation here for the protection of private property.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I am discussing this proposition in regard to which I have read from the report.

Mr. DUNN. No.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I think these remarks apply to this entire system of leveeing the Mississippi. Now I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] so far as to say that if this improvement were really for the benefit of navigation it would be no objection to it to say that it would also very much help somebody who happened to own land on the bank of the river. That would be no valid objection. I should rather it would protect somebody else if any one needed protection. But the trouble seems to be here—and it is stated not by the enemies but by the friends of these appropriations—that they are for the protection of private property, and the excuse given is that the river needs to be cleared out for navigation. So far as the city of New Orleans is concerned, it is in one respect unfortunately situated. It is not more water that they want down there; it is more land. The land is washing away. They do not ask us to clean out bars or to pull up snags in order to give them water sufficient for good navigation. Their trouble is too much navigation. The river is washing away the banks, and the proposition here is that the Government of the United States shall protect the land from the attacks of the river, and shall do it under the pretext of benefiting commerce and navigation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. The gentleman from Arkansas said there had been committees sent down to examine the work of this commission; but, Mr. Chairman, it must be remembered that they went at the very beginning of the work.

Mr. DUNN. No, the last one did not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Now it is reported—and these reports come to us from the engineers of the Army—that there has been very great destruction of these works, or some of them, during the last year; indeed during the last few months, and that there has been great destruction of the plant. I read from a newspaper dispatch dated Saint Louis, February 16, 1886.

Mr. DUNN. That is not a report of the engineers.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I say it is a newspaper dispatch, but it is largely corroborated by extracts from official documents, which I shall publish with my remarks:

ST. LOUIS, February 16, 1886.

Of the sixty-eight boats which composed the Government fleet which broke away from its moorings at Carroll's Island Sunday night, only sixteen have been saved, among them the most valuable of the steamers, which is seriously damaged. Six of the others are known to be sunk. The rest, with the large steamer, the General Humphreys, and a steam-launch, are lost and probably either sunk or considerably injured by collision with each other or with huge cakes of ice, of which the river is full. The whole fleet had cost the Government about a quarter of a million of dollars, and the loss will very nearly reach $200,000, unless some of the boats are recovered farther down the river.

The statements contained in this dispatch are, I repeat, confirmed largely by official evidence, which I submit as a part of my remarks:

FIRST DISTRICT.

* * * * * * *

A special examination of the work was made January 20 to determine the damage done by the ice. The revetment work does not appear to have suffered any injury. That to the dikes is confined to Osceola No. 4 and the high part of Gold Dust main dike below the upper break. Here the front row of piles is almost entirely destroyed. A greater part of the piles injured were broken off short at the ice level, the lower part remaining upright in the water, and the upper end dangling above it, supported by the framework of riders and braces, which had not yet fallen. The nature of the injuries to this dike indicates that they were made possible by the old and weakened cottonwood piles. Had the piles been new or in better state of preservation, there would have been few if any broken. Osceola No. 4 had at its outer end a short fragment of Osceola-Bullerton forming a T-head. This T-head and the adjacent part of Osceola No. 4 were partially wrecked and were carried away by the ice, making a clear opening at the angle of the two dikes named, and showing a well-defined depression through the bar in the direction of Bullerton chute, in which depression traces of scour were evident. * * *

SECOND DISTRICT.

The ballast, which in some places was not heavy in the first instance, was partially displaced, and the upper binders and some brush in the upper layers cut. The work still has considerable strength, and no immediate danger is apprehended; but the broken members should be replaced at the first convenient opportunity.

Caving on Hopefield Point continues, and the bar is cutting rapidly. The old incline of the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad is entirely gone, and 250 feet have been cut off the new one, which runs out over the bar about 300 yards below the old one. It is reported on the authority of the engineer of the road that the bar has cut down 8 feet under the end of the new incline.

* * * * * * *

The point of the bar opposite the Hopefield revetment has also cut away considerably.

February, 1886.

FIRST DISTRICT.

Ice and drift during the first half of the month did considerable damage to the part of the Gold Dust main dike below the lower gap. This is the highest part of the dike, where it rises onto the head of Elmot bar, and was the only part not submerged at the time of examination. This part is damaged along the entire front row, and in three places is badly wrecked. Whether any damage was done to submerged portions can not now be determined.

THIRD DISTRICT.

* * * * * * *

During the rise a great quantity of drift had accumulated in front of this dike, and as the water rose it floated over the top, lodging in front of the cross-dikes below. It is feared that the drift has destroyed some 200 feet of the dike, though of this there is at present no certainty, the top of this portion of the dike being submerged 4 feet. The dike was of four rows and considered very strong.

ILLINOIS RIVER TO OHIO RIVER.

* * * * * * *

On Saturday, February 13, the fleet, consisting of seventy one pieces, which was in winter harbor in rear of Carroll's Island, about 12 miles below this city, was torn from its moorings by floating ice and carried down the river. Some of the pieces were sunk and others damaged. At this writing three pieces have not been heard from, twenty have been collected at Chester, Ill., in good condition, thirty-one at Saint Louis, in good condition, and nine are at detached points either sunk or aground, and in process of collection, while eight pieces have been abandoned. Of the eight abandoned pieces six were carried on the books of the office as without value. The remaining two are the steamer A. A. Humphreys and one pile-driver. The movable property and the machinery of the Humphreys have been recovered. A complete list of the losses can not now be given. A board of survey is now engaged in an investigation of the disaster.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Memphis, Tenn., April 12, 1886.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report of operations in the first and second districts for the ten days ending April 10, 1886.

FIRST DISTRICT.

The last ten days have been signalized by the most important loss since the close of active operations, in the breaking in two, and probably three places of Osceola cross-dike No. 3. The latest published map of the locality is plate 38, report of 1883.

Of the two breaks known to exist the one next the bar is the larger, being as nearly as can now be estimated 500 feet wide. Through it flows a very strong current, which together with the continuous string of heavy drift prevented a detailed examination. The other break is next to the Arkansas shore; is about 100 feet wide, and has through it a depth of 24 feet and a sluggish current. These are indications, not positive, however, of a slight break about 400 feet from the last mentioned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SMITH S. LEACH,
Captain of Engineers.

General Q. A. GILLMORE,
President Mississippi River Commission, Army Building, New York.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit as a plain business proposition that if any business man proposed to expend or invest money under conditions such as here represented, he would first make a thorough inquiry into the facts. Let us know the facts about these works. Has this damage been done? Have the works been carried away? Has there been any such loss as has been reported?

Again, it has been reported that beyond the jetties, at the mouth, the Gulf is filling up, so that already, in order to keep the channel, boats are required to wind around instead of going directly out; they can not proceed directly out into the Gulf. It is reported, too, that mud lumps are forming, and that soon the jetties must be extended.

Mr. DUNN. That shows they ought to be extended, of course.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not know what the facts are. What I ask for is some reliable information. Let us ascertain the facts before we waste more millions of money—before we appropriate more millions. I do think that it is but a reasonable proposition that a committee should go down there—not a junketing committee to extend its labors through the recess, but a committee to go down now and make inquiry into the facts about these reports and find out the condition of those works, and see what damage has been done by the floods. I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DUNN. Would it not be better to wait until the flood ends?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, let the examination be made while the flood lasts. After the flood ends there may be no works there.

Mr. HEPBURN. As an amendment to the amendment of the gentlemen from Ohio, I move to strike out all after the word "war," in line 1122, down to the word "provided," in line 1124. The words which I propose to strike out are, "in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission."

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire at all to do or say anything that shall in any way aid the continuance in place of the Mississippi River Commission. I believe the formation of this commission has been a harmful experiment; that we have gone far enough with the work of that commission; that we have wasted money enough upon it, and that we ought now to retrace our steps. The Mississippi River Commission has been permitted to expend eight and a half million dollars and has accomplished, it seems to me, but very little. It has succeeded in spending $1,830,000 in the erection of levees along the Mississippi River.

Mr. DUNN. That is the best work the commission has done.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman says that is the best work the commission has done. I believe that is true, because I have no doubt the expenditure of that amount of the people's money for the protection of private property has resulted in protecting private property and in allowing the gentleman's constituents to raise crops of cotton where otherwise they would not have been able to do it. I do not wonder that the gentleman is a friend of the commission, and that he desires a continuation of these expenditures. He has in his State from 400 to 500 miles of river front to be protected by these levees. This Mississippi River Commission is committed to the expenditure of this money for the purpose of protecting by means of levees the lands of the gentleman's constituents.

I am opposed to this commission for other reasons. I have in my hand the report of the commission made in 1884; and, referring to page 2744, I find the estimated cost of the construction of the works near Plum Point up to October 1, 1884; and I desire to remind the committee that the work which has been done at Plum Point reach is limited to 13 miles. While the reach is 38 miles in length, no work has been done except upon 13 miles of it. Up to the date of this report to which I refer the commission had expended nearly $2,000,000 upon that reach. They had expended for labor $355,000, and for materials $348,000—a total for work and material upon that improvement of $703,000 of the nearly $2,000,000 that were expended.

How has the commission spent the rest of this money? One hundred and ninety-seven thousand dollars have been expended in subsistence; $561,000 in repairs, cost, and outfit of plant; $75,000 in care of property; and $305,000 in towage and use of steamers.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. HEPBURN. One million one hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars has been expended in incidentals in order to secure $703,000 of work and material placed in the improvement. How is that for economy? What man would pursue his business in that way?

Mr. Chairman, I was contradicted the other day by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], who is always ready with contradictions in this debate although he contributes but little else to the discussion. [Laughter.] On an occasion I said the Mississippi River Commission counting their vessels, large and small, had twice as many as the United States Navy. That was contradicted. I affirm in the last report of the commission it is shown they are the owners of 918 vessels, of all classes, as I before said, and yet notwithstanding they have this wonderful navy they paid for towage and the use of steamers on this reach of 13 miles $305,000.

The Mississippi River Commission have expended on river improvement nearly $4,500,000. Wherever they have expended more than this it has been for plant, it has been for levees, or it has been for the improvement of the so-called harbors on the river.

Four million five hundred thousand dollars, I say, have gone into improvements of the character of which I have spoken. Less than 40 per cent. of actual work and actual material has come out of that $4,500,000; they have expended the balance in the improvement of the property of the constituents of gentlemen who are so earnest for this bill. Property of citizens at Memphis, others at New Orleans, others at Vicksburg, and all the way along down the river, wherever they could find an alleged harbor, they have attempted to improve in some way or other. Not in the interest of navigation, or that navigation could or would be improved by the expenditure, but because there were local wants there, because there were some particular individuals who desired money to be expended in their districts.

Now, my friend from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] has shown the character of the improvement at New Orleans, where railroad property and warehouses of certain gentlemen engaged in commerce are in danger of going into the Mississippi River. Therefore the river commission has expended money in building spur-dikes and sinking them into water that is now 100 feet deep. Is not that water enough for navigation?

So it is all along that river front on both sides. There are thousands of feet—at least 40,000 feet of river front at the city of New Orleans—which it is proposed to protect; and, as one of the engineers says in the report, which was not sufficiently revised, I take it, that work is necessary in order to prevent the city of New Orleans from being destroyed—from being washed away.

I do not blame gentlemen for coming here year after year and making appeals for this improvement.

Mr. KING addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is an insidious attack upon the whole plan adopted by Congress looking to the improvement of the Mississippi River. While pretending a purpose that some plan of improvement shall be prosecuted and pursued the amendment he suggests would suspend it entirely, as I will show presently. He proposes to transfer the prosecution of the work to the Secretary of War, and my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] comes with his usual manliness and frankness and unmasks the battery planted by the gentleman from Ohio and presents before us the question fairly whether we will or will not continue the system of improvement which has been inaugurated looking to the better and safer navigation of the Mississippi River.

It is well, Mr. Chairman, for the House to understand that this amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, if adopted, will be followed immediately by one striking out the entire clause making the appropriation; because it will destroy the plans proposed by the river commission, and as a matter of course we will not need the money, and so the issue is fairly presented whether we will call a halt and abandon all purpose of improving the river or continue it on the present system.

This is the only plan which has ever been submitted looking to the systematic improvement of the navigation of the river. For many years the Government did nothing beyond a little dredging at an occasional bad bar which had formed in the river or pulling snags where they impeded the navigation, and it was only in 1879, when a commission of engineers was appointed to investigate the question, that any action was seriously taken toward the inauguration of this work.

Mr. Chairman, I have been surprised at the various points from which this work has been attacked. My friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] opened the fight by announcing with ponderous gravity that the river does not need improvement; that it is already sufficiently navigable for all commerce which seeks it. Why, Mr. Chairman, that gentleman has surely not informed himself upon this subject. I have some statistics here which were compiled many years ago, which have been published as a part of the report filed with Congress by this commission of engineers. It was estimated that from 1864 to 1872 there had been a period of fifty-two days annually in which there was a less depth of water in the river than 6 feet, and of sixty-nine days annually in which its depth was less than 10 feet.

This is a fact known to all the country, and yet my friend says that there is no necessity for the improvement of that river because there is a sufficient depth of water for navigation. Another gentleman says there is no necessity for this improvement because there is no commerce upon the river to be benefited by it. Again, I must be permitted to say that gentlemen are reckless in their assertions upon this point. I have in my hand a statement, which I have taken from the census reports for 1880, which may perhaps occasion some surprise to gentlemen who have undertaken to deride the value and extent of the commerce which floats upon this great river. According to this report of 1880 the tonnage upon the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers was 511,133,095 and they carried 7,223,000 tons.

I suppose the value of that tonnage was not less than six or seven hundred millions of dollars, and yet gentlemen assert here, as if they were in no danger of contradiction, that there is no commerce seeking the Mississippi River which can or ought to be benefited by its improvement.

Mr. BLANCHARD was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. CATCHINGS.

Mr. CATCHINGS. But, Mr. Chairman, enough has been said to show that the real animus of this attack is the apprehension on the part of certain gentlemen that some part of this money will be expended in the construction of levees along the banks of the river, whereby the Southern planters who own cotton and sugar plantations may derive some benefit. They have asserted here that the motive which prompts us gentlemen who live along the banks of the river to so strenuously advocate the continuance of this work is the hope or expectation that we will derive some individual and personal benefit from the expenditure of this money not at all connected with the improvement of the river as a great highway and artery of commerce.

Now, I know something about levee building on the Mississippi River. I say that the district which I have the honor to represent is absolutely independent of this appropriation so far as its levees are concerned. The nine river counties which I represent have expended more than $8,000,000 themselves in the construction of their levees. They are not only building them, but they are willing to build them and take care of them when built. So far as my section is concerned the charge I have referred to is entirely without foundation. I was looking this morning at a report of the last annual meeting of the board of levee commissioners, showing an expenditure last year of about $800,000 in cash, and provision made for an expenditure of as much more this year for the maintenance of their levee system.

But there is an incidental benefit which will accrue to us if this plan approved by the commission is made effectual. It is the scientific opinion of all engineers who have made an examination of the facts that one of the prime and chief results which will come from this improvement is the lowering of the flood lines and the prevention of the caving of the river banks. If you can accomplish that, we can and will make the levees as permanent as the hills themselves without asking the Government to spend a dollar. That is a prominent feature which is brought forward by the engineers. They say that the construction of these levees so deepens the channel that the flood level becomes lower, and in the course of time the necessity for the levees will cease to exist.

I wish to state a very remarkable fact with reference to this which goes to corroborate and furnish an impregnable basis for this conclusion. I can not turn to the page of the report at this moment. But I will state the fact, and I am prepared to establish it if it be disputed. Prior to the breaking out of the war the planters living along the banks of the Red River—one of the greatest and most powerful rivers on this continent, powerful in its majesty and the velocity of its floods, and running as the Mississippi does through an alluvial soil just as porous and friable as that which lines the banks of the Mississippi—had so leveed that river and its floods had been so restrained thereby that in the course of years the channel became so deepened that not even the greatest flood brought the water up so high as to touch the base of these levees.

The reduction of the flood line was so continuous that so long as the levees were maintained the people were absolutely protected. But during the war and since that time by reason of disaster and poverty having overtaken the people these leeves have been destroyed, and the river now spreads its devastating floods over the valley as does the Mississippi. That is a fact you can not beat down, because it is true, and is known to all who live in and are familiar with that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARKSDALE was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. CATCHINGS.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are other physical facts capable of demonstration in this connection. It is known, Mr. Chairman, that during the flood of 1882 a great number of crevasses occurred in the levees fronting what is known as the Yazoo basin. Prior to the flood of 1883 these had been repaired so as to exclude the flood. At Vicksburg in 1882 the flood level was 48 feet. In 1883 the flood level had been reduced to 43 feet, so that it was 5 to 6 feet less than in the previous year, notwithstanding the fact that at Helena and points above this line of levees the flood attained as great a height as that of 1883.

These are facts which go to maintain the theory advocated by these engineers. I will say also that after the subsidence of this flood soundings were taken in front of these crevasses on the Mississippi River, and in every instance it was found that just below them sand-bars had formed, and when the crevasses were closed and the levees reconstructed these shoal places were invariably scoured out and the bars entirely removed. The great Bonnet Carré crevasse, in the lower part of the river, had remained open for many years, and the velocity of the current being thereby checked, a great bar at that point had formed. As soon as that crevasse was closed the current of the river scoured out that bar, and that part of the river is to-day in as good a condition as before the forming of that crevasse.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these are the incidental benefits which we expect to accrue from the construction of levees. We have not asked this Government to give us one cent for that purpose, and the people of my district do not want it. We have expended millions of dollars ourselves, and we propose to continue to do so. We have the richest and most fruitful country on the face of the earth, and I believe there is no other section that could have borne the tax which our people have imposed upon themselves for the purpose of constructing levees and yet have found agriculture profitable, as it is with us. We have taxed our cotton two and three dollars a bale, we have taxed our land seventeen and eighteen mills an acre, for the purpose of raising a fund to build levees.

We are not paupers or beggars; we are a manful, brave people, who are not afraid to grapple with any difficulty or disaster that may come upon us; and it is an unkind thing for gentlemen to stand here and charge us with being influenced by selfish motives, when we are simply trying to carry out practically the plans submitted by this commission. What else can we do? What other plans have been proposed? We are forced to take the plans of this commission or to take nothing. Those plans are the result of scientific thought; they are plans which have received the approval of such distinguished engineers as General Gillmore, General Comstock, Major Suter, and Professor Mitchell of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. They are the identical plans which were proposed by the board of engineers in 1879, before this commission was created. We find the scientific knowledge and the scientific thought of the country standing ready to recommend and approve those plans, and we have nothing but the idle words, strongly put I confess, always so when my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] speaks, against these scientific statements and scientific judgments.

The Government will lose nothing by expending money for the building of levees, even if the sequel shall show that the power of man is not great enough to enchain and subdue the mighty energies of this majestic river. No money can be expended which is so sure to yield beneficial results.

General Abbot estimated the total area of the bottom land to be 3,200 square miles, and that if protected from inundation and made available for agricultural purposes there would be 2,500,000 acres of sugar land, 7,000,000 acres of cotton lands, and 1,000,000 acres of corn lands.

Could the nation undertake a grander or more surely profitable work than the conquering of this splendid principality, the reclamation of this rich domain? The nations of Europe vie with each other in restless schemes for the acquisition of territory, not counting the cost of blood and treasure. Here there awaits us a grander and richer territory than any they seek after, which will cost nothing but a trifling sum of money as compared with its value. In the nature of things, the people in this valley must in the main content themselves with the pursuit of agriculture.

We must continue to buy from you in exchange for our cotton and sugar the horses, mules, metal, flour, and dry goods we consume. You can find no customers who will buy more freely from you than ourselves. Save us from these floods, and no man can depict the future prosperity and greatness of this fertile valley. You are as greatly interested in this as we are. What we make at last finds its way to the great cities of the North to increase your riches. It would seem that to the people of the East at least the levee feature of this plan of improvement would be the most inviting and attractive.

But we want the navigation of the river improved also. It is the great regulator of freights, which puts down the tolls on the longitudinal lines of railways traversing the South. Stop the navigation of that stream, and we would be forced to pay the most exorbitant rates upon commodities received and shipped by us.

Mr. Stannard, of Saint Louis, estimates that the annual saving in freights by the thorough improvement of the river will amount to $28,000,000 annually.

As it is, when the low-water season comes upon us, and the large boats either abandon the river or travel it lightly laden, and we are forced to rely largely upon summer tramps, our rates go up, and the profits upon our yearly labor are correspondingly diminished.

I do not regard the plan as experimental. When I see the wonderful effect of the works at Lake Providence and Plum Point, and I find the distinguished engineers in charge expressing confidence in their ability to accomplish beneficial and permanent results, I unhesitatingly yield my approval.

The conventions which have been held within the last eighteen months voice the sentiment of the people with reference to this great scheme. They were not sugar nor cotton planters, and can not be charged with selfish motives in indorsing the plan. Nor can such motives be imputed to the engineers in charge of the works.

In a special message to Congress in 1882 President Arthur uttered these brave and manly words:

> The safe and convenient navigation of the Mississippi is a matter of concern to all sections of the country, but to the Northwest, with its immense harvests needing cheap transportation to the sea, and to the inhabitants of the river valley, whose lives and property depend upon the proper construction of the safeguards which protect them from the floods, it is of vital importance that a well matured and comprehensive plan for improvement should be put into operation with as little delay as possible.
> The cotton product of the region subject to the devastating floods is a source of wealth to the nation, and of great importance to keeping the balance of trade in our favor. It may not be inopportune to mention that this Government has imposed and collected some $70,000,000 by a tax on cotton, in the production of which the population of the Lower Mississippi is largely engaged, and it does not seem inequitable to return a portion of this tax to those who contributed it, particularly as such an action will also result in an important gain to the country at large, and especially so to the great and rich States of the Northwest and the Mississippi Valley.

They are as true now as they were then, and they sent a thrill of gratitude through the hearts of the inhabitants of the valley.

Mr. Blaine telegraphed to the New Orleans convention his hearty approval of the work designed for the improvement of the great water ways of the West, and the national Democratic convention in 1884 deemed the great Mississippi of such national consequence as to make the following a clause in its platform:

> The Federal Government should care for and improve the Mississippi River and other great water ways of the Republic, so as to secure for the United States easy and cheap transportation to tide water.

It has thus received the sanction of every popular assembly which has been called to consider it, and it can not in debate here be driven out by ridicule, prejudice, or factious criticisms.

Mr. Chairman, something has been said about the appropriations for these Southern harbors. Gentlemen speak in a most scornful manner of them and describe them as mere landing-places, mere way stations for steamboats to land and discharge their cargoes. Where do gentlemen get the authority for the assertion that those towns are not harbors in every just sense of the commercial meaning of that word? I say to gentlemen that the Supreme Court of the United States have not found any difficulty in recognizing those towns as harbors. The Supreme Court have declared them to be harbors, and have declared that this Government has the power not only to improve the navigable streams of the country, but to improve the harbors upon the borders of those streams.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. CATCHINGS.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I thank my friend.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to show to what extent this recognition has gone I say that in a cause reported as far back as 18 Howard the Supreme Court of the United States speak of the little village of Grand Gulf, located on the Lower Mississippi, as a harbor, and apply to it the rules of navigation known to admiralty law as governing the entry and departure of vessels from harbors.

This was a case of collision, and the question was, which was in fault, a steamboat about to effect a landing, or a flatboat which had already effected a landing and was moored to the shore. The court stated and explained the laws governing vessels in such circumstances, and spoke of this little village itself as a harbor. I read from 18 Howard, page 578.

> Where a boat has entered in the path of vessels a light is indispensable; but it is not required where the boat is fastened to the shore, especially at a place set apart for such boats. When a steamer is about to enter a harbor great caution is required. There being no usage as to an open way, the vigilance is thrown upon the entering vessel.

The court then go on to apply the same rules exactly which govern the entrance and departure of vessels in the great harbors of the country.

But there is a still stronger case than this, a case where the court speaks of the harbor of Savannah. I read from the case of South Carolina vs. Georgia et al., 3 Otto, page 13:

> The plaintiff next contends that if Congress has the power to authorize the construction of the work in contemplation and in progress, whereby the water will be diverted from the northern to the southern channel of the river, no such authority has been given. With this we can not concur. By an act of Congress of June 23, 1874, an appropriation was made of $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works, and, inter alia, "for the improvement of the harbor of Savannah." The act of March 3, 1875, made an additional appropriation of $70,000 "for the improvement of the harbor of Savannah, Ga." It is true that neither of these acts directed the manner in which these appropriations should be expended. The mode of improving the harbor was left to the Secretary of War, and the mode adopted under his supervision plainly tends to the improvement contemplated. We know judicially the fact that the harbor is the river in front of the city."

Thus, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that it is adjudged by the Supreme Court of the United States that these towns on the rivers are harbors, and that the harbor is the river lying in front of the town.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has always been the Congressional construction that these towns are harbors. I have taken occasion to go through the river and harbor acts of the last fifteen or twenty years, and I find each of them filled with appropriations looking to the improvement of cities lying upon these rivers; and they are always designated as harbors. So that we have a Congressional and a judicial interpretation that these are harbors in every just commercial sense of the word. The proposition now is that we shall reverse this whole line of legislation.

I say again, Mr. Chairman, that if this Government has the power to create a harbor by the construction of artificial works or otherwise it has necessarily the power to maintain that harbor when constructed. Why, sir, the Government has gone to the extent of constructing at great cost at Lewes, Del., an iron pier extending out into the ocean and furnishing a landing-place for vessels. That was not the case of the improvement of a harbor in any literal sense. It was only the improvement of a harbor because it furnished the means by which vessels could have access to people living on shore, and could furnish to and receive from them commodities.

Mr. HEPBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman from Iowa will yield a moment, I wish to make a practical suggestion to this Committee of the Whole. At 5 o'clock, under the order of the House, we take a recess, unless the time should be extended. It seems to be the general desire on all sides to have this matter closed this afternoon. To-morrow is set apart for business of the Committee on Territories; and, in view of that fact, it seems to be the desire to conclude this bill this evening. I respectfully suggest therefore that we agree upon some time within which to close debate on this paragragh and amendments and then take the vote. I suggest half past 4.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If all the amendments which gentlemen desire to offer were considered as pending, then each of the amendments might be considered in succession, and time be saved in that way.

Mr. WILLIS. There has been a great deal of diffusive debate, of course, upon this paragraph. There are two or three well-defined propositions which are always presented in connection with the Lower Mississippi. I suggest that we take up first the proposition in regard to the abolition of the Mississippi River Commission, which has already been discussed on both sides, and vote upon it and get rid of it. Then if there is another proposition—for instance, to limit these appropriations to certain limits of the river—let us discuss that and vote upon it and end it. Thus we might reach some practical conclusion. My only desire is to carry out the will of the committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I have not seen any evidence of a general desire on the part of the committee to close the debate. I see nothing of that kind. On the contrary, since we have been in committee two or three gentlemen representing the Mississippi River districts have been on the floor yielding time to each other and each making speeches fifteen or twenty minutes long. After those speeches have been delivered the proposition is made to limit debate. It seems to me that gentlemen having amendments to offer ought to be allowed debate in support of those amendments. I think, therefore, it is impossible to fix a time when debate on this section shall be closed. Some gentlemen who have amendments have not been heard at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that the debate would perhaps be abbreviated by permitting all amendments which gentlemen desire to offer to this proposition to be pending together. If that be agreed to I desire to submit an amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. With the view of carrying out the wish of the House, I ask, as the days are very long now, that by unanimous consent the hour for the recess be extended from 5 o'clock till 6 o'clock, but I announce that I shall not call a yea-and-nay vote on this bill until the House is full.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. This is the most important part of this bill. We have before us an appropriation of $2,000,000 for the Mississippi River. It is to my mind the most objectionable of all the paragraphs in the bill, and I think it should be fully ventilated. If any gentleman desires to offer an amendment he should have an opportunity, and if he desires to discuss his amendment he should also have an opportunity to do that. Therefore I will not give my consent to the proposition to close debate.

Mr. WILLIS. My proposition is in the direction of the gentleman's wishes. I propose that we have another hour.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MILLS). Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS]. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "levees," in line 1125, down to and including the word "channel," in line 1130.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order. Two amendments are already pending.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understood that by unanimous consent it had been agreed that all amendments gentlemen desired to offer might be sent up, to be voted on in their order.

The CHAIRMAN. No such order has been made.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks recently made here upon the subject of levees there is something which I am very glad to hear. I am glad to hear gentlemen now put this proposition to spend money in the erection of levees upon another ground than the unfortunately fraudulent one that the proposition has heretofore been placed upon. Gentlemen now tell us that because of the necessities of the case and because of the extraordinary benefits resulting from the protection of the lands, therefore these moneys should be expended. I commend you, gentlemen, for the honesty of this avowal. It is much better, it is much fairer to us, to put the matter upon that ground than to try to trick us into voting appropriations of this character.

This is the honest way to place it. If gentlemen will make an argument that will satisfy me of the astonishing good to result from it, good of a national character, I am ready to vote for it on that basis. But if I do a matter of that kind, or on their appeals should be willing to vote for the advantage of the people on the Lower Mississippi, I want to have the credit of it. I do not want to be tricked even into doing a good thing.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] was exceedingly unfortunate in the suggestion he made a while ago that more money had been expended on the Des Moines River in Iowa than had been expended in the Lower Mississippi.

Mr. KING. What is that?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will state to the gentleman there never has been a dollar of the public money expended on the Des Moines River.

Mr. KING. I appeal to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. HEPBURN. There never was a dollar of the public money expended on the Des Moines River.

Mr. KING. I meant the Des Moines Rapids.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; there was a grant of land made by Congress years ago, in 1846, for the Des Moines Rapids. The gentleman is unfortunate in calling that back to the memory of the House, because there was no sweet savor in connection with the matter.

Mr. KING. I referred to the Des Moines Rapids.

Mr. HEPBURN. There was a land grant, 200 miles long and 5 miles wide, of the best land in the State of Iowa squandered, stolen by the Democratic party of that Territory and used in building imperfect and insufficient dams across that river. That is the expenditure on the Des Moines River to which the gentleman referred. He was very unfortunate in his reference.

Mr. KING. Of course it was understood that I referred to the improvement made by the Government on the Des Moines Rapids.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then why did you not say that? The gentleman is old enough to say what he means.

Mr. KING. Certainly I am; and everybody knew to what I referred.

Mr. HEPBURN. But the gentleman did not say it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Who had charge of the expenditure of the proceeds of that land grant?

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, the Democratic party of Iowa.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The State of Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. The Democratic party of the State.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The State of Iowa; for that always makes the grant to a State. If your people stole it, that is your business, of course.

Mr. KING. Is not the Des Moines Rapids in Illinois?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is in the Mississippi River between Illinois and Iowa.

Mr. KING. Ah! The gentleman should correct his geography.

Mr. HEPBURN. My geography is correct. You must correct your statement.

Mr. KING. You might as well say the Atlantic Ocean is not on the coast of New York. One statement would be as correct as the other.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, gentlemen have suggested this business of the Mississippi River Commission was deliberately gone into. That is true, perhaps, but it was admitted as an experiment. I suggest, now, the experiment has been fully tried and shown to be a failure. When this experiment was inaugurated no one dreamed of the wonderfully prodigal expenditure which would be indulged in. Does the gentleman know upon this much-talked-of Plum Point reach upon the revetment alone they have expended $19.99 for every linear foot improved; and upon the channel improvement they have expended twenty-four dollars and a fraction for every linear foot? Wherever there is a bank improvement and revetment both necessary there is involved an expenditure of $45 for each linear foot.

Mr. BURROWS. How much have they expended on that reach?

Mr. HEPBURN. Already they have expended nearly two and a half million of dollars, and they have confined their work to 13 miles out of the 38 of that reach. They have already, Mr. Chairman, nearly doubled the first estimate of expenditure on that reach.

Mr. BURROWS. Let me inquire, further, whether the commission does not state that the work is not yet done?

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, sir, not one-third of it is done. Plum Point reach will require, if you contiue the improvement on the plans now adopted, and if they are not cheapened in their execution—Plum Point alone will cost more than $10,000,000.

Mr. KING. That is what you say.

Mr. HEPBURN. And Lake Providence reach will cost more than $7,000,000 for a distance of 25 miles. Are we ready to go on with that kind of expenditure?

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is without any estimate at all of the cost of the levees. What these gentlemen actually want, what they really want is their harbors improved, and their levees are all outside of these. It is infinitely better for the Government that we should give them all they demand for the improvement of their harbors, all they demand for the improvement of their rivers, give them that and then save some portion of this other extraordinarily extravagant expenditure for levees. I do hope that we will call a halt in this reckless expenditure. I want to affirm again for myself my perfect willingness to vote ample appropriations for the legitimate improvement of our rivers; wherever there is a bar I am willing it shall be removed; wherever there is a snag I am willing it shall be taken up and that at the public expense; but I am not willing to go on year after year in making these appropriations that will be of so little use to the navigation of the river.

I want to remind this committee—the chairman of the committee—that in the bill he presented to this House in the last session of the last Congress he utterly and entirely repudiated the commission, distrusting it apparently and unwilling longer to give it his confidence, for he proposed to put over it a supervising agent; he proposed to ignore its plans and every other plan, and compel the commission under the plans of another engineer named in the bill to continue the work. Why, I would remind gentlemen that there were many on that side of the House who were opposed to the continuance of the commission.

Mr. DUNN was recognized.

Mr. WILLIS. I do hope we will make some progress with the bill. I would like to ask gentlemen if they will not consent to take a vote now on some of these amendments.

Mr. DUNN. If a vote can be taken at once I am perfectly willing to yield the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I ask for a vote on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], by striking out in lines 1122 and 1123 the following words:

"In accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 45, noes 83.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum.

Mr. WILLIS. I would suggest to my friend from Iowa if he desires a vote on this bare proposition, and I know that he does not desire to make any factious opposition to getting on with the bill, that we will take a vote in the House on this amendment if that will satisfy him.

Mr. HEPBURN. With that understanding, which is perfectly satisfactory to me, I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in after the word "commission."

The CHAIRMAN. Is this an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not; but there is now but a single amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word "commission," in line 1123:

"Provided, That the money appropriated by this act for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, except so much thereof as it shall be necessary to expend in preventing the works in progress on other portions of the river from waste and injury, shall be expended in the continuation and completion of the works on the Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches of the river now in progress of improvement, as established by the Mississippi River Commission, to the end that the proposed improvement of said two reaches of the river, on which the works are in progress, shall be completed at an early day and the plan of said commission for the improvement of the navigation of the river fully tested."

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken. Before the announcement of the result,

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not know that the gentleman sought the floor. Of course he will be recognized.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as the Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

It also announced that the Senate had passed a resolution and bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A concurrent resolution to print 2,000 copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the year 1885;

A bill (S. 165) for the relief of William H. Gray, of Kentucky;

A bill (S. 167) for the relief of Frederick W. Ruggles, of Westport, Nova Scotia;

A bill (S. 267) for the relief of Edway A. Grant;

A bill (S. 472) for the relief of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Rev. Worcester Willey, and Esther Smith; and

A bill (S. 1071) for the relief of Frances W. Dyer.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the committee will devote a few moments to the careful consideration of the proposition I have submitted. I hope gentlemen will understand exactly the purpose of the amendment. One objection to the method adopted by the Mississippi River Commission for the improvement of that river is that it seeks to make expenditures on extensive works at different points of the river from Cairo to the head of the jetties, and the result has been that notwithstanding some $8,000,000 have been expended by the commission a very large portion of the money has been lost. No portion of the work has been completed at any point, and the floods have wrecked the incomplete works, necessarily requiring large sums annually in making repairs. Indeed the reports read as if repairs were the principal business of the commission.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I rise to a point of order, or rather to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Was not the committee dividing on the amendment when the gentleman from Indiana addressed the Chair? The Chair had called for the "ay" vote and also for the "no" vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair in putting the question had not heard the gentleman from Indiana seeking recognition. He recognized the gentleman when he understood that he desired to be heard. The gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The pending proposition is that the money appropriated by the bill for the improvement of the river from the Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River shall be expended on two reaches, Plum Point and Lake Providence, to the end that the improvement of those two reaches shall be completed at the earliest practicable date, to fully test the plan of the commission.

That is the substance of the entire proposition. The river between Cairo and the Head of the Passes below New Orleans is divided into "reaches," according to the plan of the commission. Plum Point reach alone is 40 miles in length. No work has been done on any part of it, except for about 13 miles. The last report of the commission informs us that the work at Osceola chute, which is within the Plum Point reach, was in admirable condition. And yet now the public press makes this announcement: "The Mississippi River has washed away the costly Government works at Osceola." Osceola is at the heart, so to speak, of your improvements at the Plum Point reach.

The Lake Providence is farther down.

The same unhappy result it would seem has followed there. In the last report the commission, in speaking of the works at Mayersville, in that reach, makes this statement:

MAYERSVILLE SYSTEM.

Cottonwood dikes.—This is new work, and has been constructed during the past season. It is shown on the progress sketch. Its object is to contract the channel way, regularize the channel, and hold it in the bend of Mayersville Island (No. 93).

A new feature in these dikes is a parallel interior longitudinal dike in addition to the usual cross-dikes. Their construction has resulted in a considerable fill below and behind them, thus building up the bar and keeping the channel on the other side. The whole of the work is in good condition, and is the most compact and symmetrical piece of dike-work on the reach.

Yet the following announcement was published by the newspapers on yesterday:

VICKSBURG, MISS., April 29.

The Government works at Mayersville, Miss., built under the supervision of the river commission, have been almost totally swept away.

If these statements are true several hundred thousand dollars of expenditure has come to nothing; I think the first work named cost about $380,000.

Mr. CATCHINGS. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana I will read a telegram I have received as to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will pardon me for a moment. This, it is true, is only a newspaper report, but wrecks and repairs have been the regular order, and the fact remains that in the reports made to us it appears that in 1884, and again in 1885, a very large percentage of the money appropriated was being expended for the simple purpose of repair, and yet the commission only began its work in 1879. I insist, sir, we should test this plan fully on those two important reaches, Plum Point and Lake Providence.

I am not speaking in a spirit of hostility to the improvement of the Mississippi River. My constituents are largely interested in the navigation of the Mississippi River. It is an important highway to a market for their produce. But I do not attach any importance to the plan of the Mississippi River Commission as a means of improving navigation. I do not believe in the commission, but I think it of the highest importance that the plan, since it has been adopted, should be fully tested at the earliest moment, and I think Congress ought to have it fully tested at as early a day as is possible, so that if it proves a failure this lavish expenditure of millions a year may be arrested. If it should prove a success and secure an actual improvement in the navigation of the Mississippi, then Congress could proceed with safety in further appropriations.

I do not myself believe that the plan of the commission will succeed. The opinion of rivermen generally is against it. They generally express the belief that what is required on the Lower Mississippi is that the great river should be well lighted and kept clear of snags. As a member of the committee which has been referred to, I was compelled to reach the conclusion that the plan adopted would not accomplish the purpose of controlling and improving the navigable capacity of the river, but would result in failure. I insist these two reaches at furthest—I should prefer only one of them—should be first completed, so that the country shall be fully informed as to the value of this expensive commission and Congress shall know whether it is justifiable to continue further these large annual expenditures.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MILLS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the Friday evening session may be set aside for to-night. It appears there are but eleven bills on the Calendar where the reports have been printed in sufficient time to be circulated among the members. There are in all thirty pension bills on the Calendar for the action of the House, but eleven are not in such a condition that they could be acted upon, because the reports have not been circulated. There is no need therefore for an evening session, and I ask unanimous consent that the order for this evening only be set aside.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and pending that, I move that debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to one hour.

Mr. HEPBURN. How much time does the gentleman propose to give to this side?

Mr. WILLIS. One-half of the time.

Mr. HEPBURN. Give us two-thirds of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. We can not do that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I apprehend there will be no serious discussion on any other item in the bill. I think the controversy will be on this, and that the time might be extended, say, to an hour and a half.

Mr. WILLIS. I will agree to that.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Do I understand it is proposed to close debate on the whole section?

Mr. WILLIS. On this paragraph and the amendments thereto.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Why do you not let us have all the time we want?

Mr. WILLIS. I am consulting gentlemen on the other side, and agree to give all the time that has been asked for.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It is now about twenty minutes after 3 o'clock. I suggest that the debate be closed at 5.

Mr. WILLIS. I will agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be closed at 5 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was also agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. MILLS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH was recognized.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is the time to be divided under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to my friend the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that I have not the slightest disposition to oppose the river and harbor bill as a whole. I think the committee have labored judiciously and, as far as any of us can, disinterestedly in preparing a bill that would have the approbation of the people of this country. But I desire to call attention to the particular item relating to the improvement of the Lower Mississippi, because I think the idea obtains, and very properly, that if there is a fly in this ointment (and in my judgment there is) it is this provision in regard to the Mississippi River, and whether we vote this in or vote it out will, I submit, settle the question as to whether there is more fly than ointment. [Laughter.] Possibly we may be in error in regard to the plan adopted by the commission for the improvement of that river, but I am unable to bring myself to that conclusion. I desire to call the attention of the committee, and especially the attention of my friend who has charge of this bill, to the provision which purports to direct that no part of the appropriation of $2,250,000 shall be used "to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands, or preventing injury to lands by overflow." I allude to the two provisions found in lines 1124 to and including 1130. These provisions, when read together in connection with a clause in the report of the Mississippi River Commission, would seem to smack a little of disingenuousness.

The clause in this bill already quoted provides, and very properly, "that no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands, or preventing injury to lands by overflow." The proviso which immediately follows, when read (in the light of the report of the commission) makes it mandatory upon the commission to do the very thing the preceding clause prohibits, i. e., build levees! I beg the committee to observe the precise language of the second proviso, and note how it palpably nullifies the first. I read it:

Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to build levees, if in their judgment, it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to navigation and commerce, and to deepen the channel.

Now turn to the report of the Mississippi River Commission for 1885, part 4, page 2865, and you will see that the commission has said distinctly, in speaking of the levee system:

Levees exert a direct influence in deepening the channel and enlarging the bed of the river.

And again, on same page, the commission say that—

They [the levees] give safety and ease to navigation.

So it is palpable that while the committee soothed the House with the provision, in large type, that levees should not be built or repaired, &c., they in a quiet, unobtrusive way provide in the next clause that the commission may build and repair levees whenever and wherever they may deem that such work will tend to "deepen the channel" * * * and "give safety and ease to navigation." And the commission having already declared that the building and repair of levees tended to do both—that is, "to deepen the channel and give safety and ease to navigation"—it follows that under the terms of this bill the commission may build and repair levees from Cairo to the Gulf; and that vast sums will be expended in that way is beyond question, and that the prime object is to protect riparian owners I as little question.

That the prime object of the last-mentioned clause of the bill is to secure to riparian owners the protection which levees constructed by the Government will afford, seems clear from the clause itself and the hostility of the committee to any amendment calculated to restrict the operation of the clause. The language of the commission is:

It was the opinion of the majority of the commission that in time of bank overflow levees exert a direct action in deepening the channel and enlarging the bed of the river, and they are regarded as a desirable though not a necessary adjunct in the general system of improvement submitted.

My friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] asked whether there was any concern upon the part of any gentleman here to oppose this measure, because as an incident to improving the navigation, benefit may result to the riparian owners. No, sir; no, sir; there is no such feeling on the part of any gentleman opposed to this system.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, and yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I thank my friend.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I understand that the time is to be divided equally between the two sides. Now, are the gentlemen on the other side to take up all in a lump?

Mr. WILLIS. The agreement was that the time should be equally divided.

Mr. DUNN. I hope, then, that the time in favor of the bill will be placed at the disposal of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Chair will place one-half the time under the control of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] and the other half under the control of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, when the point of order was made I was about to say to my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] that as between two systems equally efficacious for improving the navigation of the Mississippi, one of which would tend to benefit the riparian owners while the other would not, no gentleman upon this floor would hesitate a moment to decide in favor of the one which would benefit the riparian owners unless its cost were very much greater than the cost of the other system.

Mr. DUNN. Yet your decision seems to be against it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My decision is not against any system that will, while improving navigation, at the same time protect the lands of riparian owners. The point is, that no such system of improvement has been presented, nor do I understand the report of the Mississippi River Commission, as reflected in the line of their experience, to present such a system. And I do not understand it to be the well-considered judgment of the competent engineers of this country that this system of levees is needful for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River. It is at most and best an adjunct of doubtful utility, as shown in the report of the commission, and of no utility, judged by the experiment of its use. If it were otherwise, certainly no one would have any objection to such improvement. General Comstock, of the Engineer Corps——

Mr. DUNN. And he alone.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. General Comstock suggests very properly, and every man familiar with the character of the soil along the banks of the Mississippi, from Cairo down to the Balize, will understand the pertinence and wisdom of his view—he suggests that the improvement of the banks at these various points under the plan of the Mississippi River Commission, can not be permanent unless there is an improvement both above and below the work, the object being to prevent the water making its way behind the mattresses, &c., and carrying it all out into the river. And, inasmuch as the character of the soil is such as has been described by my honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], that improvement must necessarily extend clear above the danger line and below the danger line; in other words, it must reach from the jetties to Cairo.

The great difficulty in this matter of improving the Lower Mississippi is found in the fact, that a crawfish can destroy faster than an engineer can construct. In fact, in the conflict an engineer finds every crawfish his equal and every muskrat his superior. [Laughter.] And the reason of this will become apparent to every man who will investigate the character of the banks of the Lower Mississippi. The soil is alluvial down to a depth not merely of 8 or 10, but 20, 30, 40, 100 feet, and more. This soil, as stated by my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], contains no clay, no stone or gravel, and is so light and friable that it melts in the water like snow, and therefore the channel of the river is constantly changing, unless when the light sediment begins to accumulate at any point, the dredge is used. A French engineer, who had given careful investigation and study to the Mississippi River with a view to improving its channel, said that the Lord had fixed metes and bounds to everything except the Mississippi River, but that stream He had turned loose and told it to "go it;" and it has been going it ever since [laughter], substantially a law unto itself, and subject to no human control so far as present experience has enabled us to judge.

I want to say to my friend from Arkansas [Judge DUNN] that it was not the judgment of the Mississippi River Committee, over which my honored friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] presided, that this improvement by the commission should be extended along the whole line of the river, or even along the several reaches where improvements had been proposed. On the contrary, that committee recommended unanimously, I think—it may be that my friend from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] or my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] dissented—but I think the committee, with substantial unanimity, recommended that this system of protecting the banks from caving, should be thoroughly tested by completing the work on the Providence and Plum Point reaches, and that no other work of the same or similar character should be begun until the experiment at the two reaches named should settle the question as to the wisdom and utility of the plan. Nobody on the committee had any patience with a levee system as a means of improving the navigation of that river. Experiments as recited by my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] show how desirable it was to limit the efforts of the commission to those reaches, and not to extend the appropriation to other points.

Mr. BURROWS. Was it not so restricted in the next bill?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No, sir; that was then as now the very point insisted upon, to restrict the appropriation. I speak of the appropriation made at the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress immediately after we made the report. The restriction recommended by the committee was not adopted.

Now I want to say to my friends that they greatly mistake the tone and temper of those who sit in judgment upon this improvement in supposing that we have any other desire than to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River. The point I make is that its navigation is hardly sought to be improved by the levee system. If it is improved, the improvement of the navigation is a mere and remote incident; the benefit chiefly sought is to the riparian owners. This bill affects to do one thing, while it palpably does, and if I am not deceived is intended to do, quite another thing.

What I desire to say now is, that if it shall please gentlemen interested in these levee improvements to present a bill to this House asking an appropriation to complete their levee system, I am not sure that I would not favor such a proposition. But I want it put on the distinct ground that during the war your levees were destroyed, and since the war you can not control the labor to keep them intact. I know that to be the case. Before the war when a levee broke at any point, the planters in the vicinity called their men together, rushed to the break, and restored the levee. But they can not do so now, because they can not control the labor. Hence when there is a crevasse at several places and laborers are summoned they do not come. It is a question whether in view of an empire in extent that may be reclaimed, you might not fairly ask this Government to make an appropriation to aid you temporarily to restore your levees which have been destroyed, and which, unaided and by yourselves, you are unable to restore. But what I suggest is that it should not come in this way in the disguise of an appropriation to "improve the navigation of the Mississippi River."

It was not the judgment of the engineers engaged upon the work that the system adopted by the Mississippi Commission was a wise and proper one as a means necessary to that end, if the end be solely to improve the navigation of the river. The influences and surroundings of the commission have tended to induce them to reason in the direction of their desires, and their desire has obviously been to keep within the cold letter of the law by improving the channel of the river a little, so there might be found in their plan a trace of the element essential to justify their work; hence the phrases in their report about levees tending to secure ease and safety to navigation, deepening channel, &c.

No one questions that under certain conditions, by confining the water, the channel may possibly be deepened. That, however, is a grave question in connection with the Mississippi River, which differs in character from all other rivers; but I have yet to meet a steamboatman or a practical civil engineer who is familiar with the character of the banks and the nature of the currents of the Lower Mississippi who has suggested that all the improvement or help that is needed to navigation upon the Mississippi River could not be secured by dredging and by snag-boats. The concurrent testimony is that the currents and channel can be corrected and in large measure controlled by dredge-boats, supplemented by snag-boats; but this, of course, would not help the riparian owners in restoring their levees to protect the lands against overflows.

Why, sir, we never heard special complaint of the navigation of the Mississippi River until it became necessary to rebuild the levees, to prevent damage from overflow. But since the planters have found themselves unable to build and repair the levees, and a strict construction of the Constitution has fallen into disfavor among them, the building and repairing of levees has become a matter of colossal importance and commands the lion's share of the appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Why, gentlemen, we have as much interest in the Mississippi River as you who reside along its banks, except in the matter of riparian ownership. A very large part of our commerce goes down that great river—our wheat, our corn, our cattle, our hogs. But we do not for that reason feel authorized or justified in asking the whole people to appropriate millions and millions of dollars out of the national Treasury ostensibly to do a little good to the channel, while the great and permanent good is done and intended to be done to the riparian owners. What is the object of appropriations for rivers and harbors? To secure aid to commerce by improving navigation. The Government has jurisdiction over all the navigable waters in this country, and commerce is found upon them everywhere, and hence the navigation of all those waters becomes the object of national care. We are all interested in the great harbor of New York. Why? Because supplies for the whole country, or a large part of those supplies, come in at that port, and a large part of our exports are shipped from that point. It is a great distributing center. We are interested in the same way, though to a less extent, in the harbor of New Orleans and in the harbor of Natchez and Vicksburg.

On this point I dissent from the position of my honored friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. Wherever there is a distributing point upon navigable water in this country the whole people are interested in it, and it becomes per force of that fact the object of national care. It is a question of degree. All are of greater or less importance, and in dealing with the great arteries and the veins of our commerce a wise and just discrimination should obtain.

In discussing this question we must constantly bear in mind that the real purpose of bills of this kind is to improve rivers and harbors for purposes of navigation, not simply to let such improvement be incidental. I do not believe that the system under consideration even tends substantially to improve the navigation of the Mississippi. Gentlemen, how is it that so many of the people in that section who are interested in levees, are opposed to the outlet system, notwithstanding they are threatened with overflow from backwater? One would think that when the water becomes too high in the channel, when the banks become full and the mouth of the stream is not large enough to discharge the vast volume through that natural outlet, the way to secure relief would be to reduce the volume of backwater by drawing it off through artificial outlets.

That is God's plan, at any rate; but of course He has not the knowledge and experience of the Mississippi River Commission. [Laughter.] Those learned pundits say the way to get rid of the surplus water in the river is not to let it escape by any channel. This seems paradoxical to everybody except the engineers of the Mississippi River Commission. The swelling volume of water below New Orleans tore its way to the Gulf through "Cubit's Gap" and the "Jump," but still the outlet is insufficient. The outlet system would interfere with the levee system, and hence must not be adopted until the levees above New Orleans are built and put in good repair. By building levees it is said the bottom of the river will be scoured out and the channel cut deeper. That has not been the result upon the River Po. The River Po is now in places substantially on stilts, the construction of levees year after year having resulted in raising the bottom of that stream by the deposit of sediment until the river is up above the towns along its course.

Mr. KING. That statement is denied by Major Suter, who made an inspection of that river.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I state the recorded history of the improvements of the River Po.

I have not called in question the fact that the jetty system accomplished in one respect what it undertook to accomplish, that is to deepen the channel, to provide a narrow but sufficient highway to the ocean. Our investigation showed us that since the jetties had been constructed ships drawing 26 feet of water could pass readily through that highway. But the dredge is used almost daily in and about the mouth of the jetties to stir up the sediment that it may be carried away by the current, and a dredge could do the like service with the same result at any point along the upper river where a bar is forming, but of course this would interfere with the levee system. Before the construction of the jetties, and as a part of the plan for their construction, one dam was placed across one mouth of the Mississippi and another dam across the other, to concentrate the water and compel it to pass between the walls of the jetties.

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield further to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I thank the gentleman for the courtesy. Now, by using a dredging boat in the jetties they are able to keep them open and to secure a sufficient channel out into the Gulf. But the damming of those mouths checked the flow of water and raised the flood-line, and caused overflows. To provide against this danger I thought and my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] thought that inasmuch as there was a vast surplus of water held in a great basin above the mouth of the river, and inasmuch as the gulf in the neighborhood of this back-water is 15 feet lower than the flood-line of the river, it would be a natural and feasible plan to cut a way through the narrow strip of land which separated the Mississippi from the Gulf. The result would seem to ordinary mortals to be inevitable, that is, to draw off the surplus water. But our friends on the Mississippi River Commission thought and said it would lead to a "diffusion and waste." Waste of water! We had not supposed that there had been any complaint of scarcity of water. That is the very fluid of which there seemed to be an excess, and it would seem that the thing desired was to dispose of that very large surplus which threatened in its onward sweep to the sea to devastate the country, unless some natural or artificial outlet could be found to control its volume and course.

I do not care to review the arguments made by my honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] touching the fact that this plan of the Mississippi commission has been a failure. I agree with him in his conclusions, and hence deem this item in the bill indefensible; and beyond that it has no proper place here, since it palpably belongs to the committee especially charged with the improvement of the Mississippi River. It seems to find a place here only because the good parts of the bill are of such importance that the House may accept it as a whole notwithstanding this serious defect. I submit to the committee that it is unjust by this system of grouping the good and the bad, the wise and the unwise provisions, to compel us to accept all or lose all. The plan, however, like the Mississippi scheme, suggests advantages when considered in connection with the end in view. But instead of the method here proposed to secure the building of levees, I suggest to my friends from the region bordering on the river along which this system is to be carried on that if instead of attaining the end in this dubious way they will ask a direct appropriation to rebuild their levees I will go to the ultima thule in voting such relief as ought to be granted in view of the circumstances which surround them and to which I have already referred.

The amendment I have offered here, and which by the way was prepared by my honored colleague [Mr. LITTLE], looks to having that done which is necessary to improve the navigation of the river. Is that what we want, or not? Does our duty require or permit us to do more?

The amendment also provides that the commission may take steps to secure and protect the works now under way, if in the opinion of the President it is necessary, in view of their possible utility and in case they will sustain substantial damage by reason of not having further sums expended on them for repairs, &c.

My amendment reads as follows:

Add at the end of line 1130 the following:

"And provided further, That this appropriation shall not be available for any improvement other than the removal of obstructions from, and the dredging of, said river, and the completion of unfinished works thereon the discontinuance of which would, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, work a material injury to commerce, until the plan of such improvement, with estimates of the expense thereof, shall have been submitted to the President and by him approved, and then only to the extent, to be designated by him, necessary for the improvement thus having his approval."

I have offered it, Mr. Chairman, because I deem it important to carry out the wish of our people, which is to make appropriations to improve navigation.

I have a word to say in regard to this river and harbor bill, with the objectionable clause eliminated therefrom. I am heartily in favor of a river and harbor bill which not only makes suitable provision for the great arteries of trade and commerce but cares for the important veins in our great system of water ways as well. I do not intend to convey the idea that there are not improper appropriations in this bill, or that the committee may not have erred in their judgment; but, sir, we know that not only is it true of river and harbor bills, but in all matters of great concern to the whole country, that concessions must be made. The wisest thing is never done, but the wisest thing attainable under all the circumstances. We must keep constantly in mind that each citizen is interested in the commerce, whether much or little, on every navigable stream in the United States; and what a grand system of water ways we have. Why, sir, you can start from the Belize, and without doubling 1 foot you can travel upon the navigable waters of the great valley drained by the Mississippi, 22,000 miles.

Think of it! 22,000 miles of navigable water from the Belize up to our northern boundary. And upon that magnificent system of water ways our commerce is in its infancy—its very swaddling clothes. These streams are the people's natural highways of commerce, to which our splendid railroad system is supplemental. They are when rightly understood necessary and indispensable component parts of a complete system of transportation. The competition between the river and the railway is not destructive of either but healthful to both. No intelligent citizen would wish to have the usefulness of either impaired. It is surprising to hear gentlemen from New York city, and some other gentlemen from along the Atlantic coast, opposing all appropriations to improve navigation upon our Western rivers. The attitude of these gentlemen is alike ungenerous and unjust. As to New York, she should not forget that she tithes and tolls all the people of the West. We neither export nor import without paying tribute to New York, and no small tribute either.

The last people on earth to complain of appropriations for our Western system of water ways should be the people of New York. As all roads lead to Rome, so it seems all efforts wherever and however put forth in this country must ultimately contribute something to the prosperity of New York. It is a great commercial nerve center. We are as proud of it as we could be of any foreign city located on our shores.

The great rivers and lakes constitute the arteries of commerce. The smaller rivers are as veins which carry the healthful life-blood of trade back to the great centers. They are mutually dependent upon each other, and the destruction of one system would be a direct blow at the other.

The farmer in the middle of Kansas is as much interested in this system of transportation as the farmer who lives on the bank of the Mississippi or the Ohio. He is affected just as much and in exactly the same way in the matter of getting his produce to market. If he will reflect a moment he will see that he is interested in the produce of every acre of land in the United States, and in the means of reaching the markets of the world with the product of each acre, since all these tend to determine and fix the price of each bushel of grain and every pound of pork and beef he produces. The saving in cost of transportation by the improvement of our water ways, as contemplated in this bill, amounts each year to a hundred times the amount appropriated. Every man who pays taxes more than gets his money back.

This bill if passed as presented, with all its imperfections on its head, including the inexcusable item for the Mississippi, would amount to less than 25 cents apiece for all our people.

Why, sir, one enterprising hen, with a little encouragement, would lay eggs enough any month in the year to pay her owner's share of this tax. [Laughter and applause.] One watermelon will sell for enough, one pumpkin will sell for enough, to pay the amount of the tax that would be assessed against any one farmer if the amount appropriated by this bill was charged per capita among all our people; and in fact it ultimately comes to that. I mention this merely to show that the cost is small, the advantage incalculably great. A single word more. I have not observed complaints from the valleys of the Ohio and the Mississippi that vast sums have been appropriated to improve the harbors along the Atlantic coast. For a century almost that work has been going on—going on as a part of the same system which is recognized and cherished in this bill. Your part of the system relates in large measure to the coast line; ours to the great inland rivers, upon which there is a hundred, yea, a thousand fold more commerce than the Atlantic coast has ever dreamed of. But, as I said, we do not complain; we realize that the prosperity of the whole country must be found in the prosperity of the several parts.

Touching the amount carried by this bill, I wish to remind gentlemen that France, with not a twentieth part of the coast line and navigable water way that we have, expends a greater sum each year than we do in improving and keeping them in repair.

I am certain this system of improvement of our water ways will never be abandoned. I shall try to correct the errors of this bill, but the necessity for improving our rivers and harbors is so great and pressing that what I may conceive to be errors of judgment on the part of the committee reporting the measure shall not drive me to vote against it. I trust the Senate will strike out or limit the appropriation for the Mississippi River.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KING addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. How much time have we remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Your side has consumed twenty-five minutes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I occupied ten minutes; and the whole time was one hour and forty minutes; half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky and half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] consumed twenty minutes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. BURROWS. The real friends of the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River ought to support the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. That amendment provides that so much of this appropriation as may be necessary to protect the works now in progress of construction at other points of the river than at Lake Providence and Plum Point reaches may be used for that purpose, and the balance of the appropriation shall be confined to these two points, and bring the work at those two points to a completion, so that it may be demonstrated in the first instance whether this plan is the best plan for the improvement of this stream.

I repeat that the real friends of the improvement of that river ought to support this amendment. For this House, the members of this committee, and the country are not satisfied that this plan is the proper plan.

Why, sir, I was talking with a member of the commission within the last twenty-four hours, and he said to me that $66,000 of expenditure at Vicksburg was absolutely thrown away. He said that when the commission entered upon its work one of the plans for improving the Mississippi was to narrow the channel, and that was effected wherever they found the channel wide. If there was an island in the center of the stream, or near the center, and the stream divided, the plan was to cut off the stream on the one side and throw the current all into the other channel. In order to accomplish that, and to cut off the chute, as it is called, they drove a line of piles from the upper end of the chute to the mainland. In every single instance that work has been swept away, because the plan was defective. And I am told by the commission—they so state in their report—that whenever snags in a flood strike this piling they take it down the stream. They consequently abandoned that entire work, and it is now a loss. They now try to improve the channel by driving the piles at the lower end of the chute, so that the sand will silt in and fill up the channel backward.

We have spent on Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches four and one half millions of dollars. The work there is not completed yet, and no member of this committee and no man in this country can tell what it will cost; and, when completed, I am told by the members of the commission that if this river was improved according to the plans of the commission from Cairo to the Gulf it will take a million of dollars every year to maintain the improvements.

Then take the improvement of revetting the banks. In the main that will stand, possibly. But the commission have just discovered that you may revet the bank ever so securely, and it will not stand if you do not draw off the overflow of water, and they find that whenever the river overflows the banks——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield the gentleman from Michigan three minutes more.

Mr. BURROWS. The committee find that, even where the bank is revetted, in flood-time when the water overflows the bank and settles on the country beyond, that revetted bank will not stand unless they make another improvement, to wit, unless they dig a canal below that revetted bank to take off the waters that are in the country. If you do not do that, the pressure of the waters against the bank, which is made up of alluvial soil, is so strong that it will cave the bank in and take your revetments down the river. So in every case of that kind it is necessary to construct canals or channels to save the revetted bank.

I repeat, every friend of the Mississippi River—and it has no stronger friend than myself—ought to stand by this amendment and open, if need be, the Treasury of the United States, and say to this commission, "Apply your genius, your money, all your skill to these two reaches, Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches—those two, and see if the plan determined upon by the commission is the correct plan; and if it is, if you narrow the channel, and if you protect the banks, and if you improve the navigation at these two reaches in the river, and that is demonstrated, that will be an end of the discussion upon the improvement of the Mississippi River."

The people North and South and everywhere will pay out with prodigal hand whatever is required for the improvement of that stream. But they do protest against scattering this work all the way from Cairo to the Gulf, at this point and that point, on a plan which is at least an experiment.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is what is called the diffusion process.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield the gentleman from Michigan more time if he desires it.

Mr. BURROWS. I think I have said about all I wanted to say.

Mr. WILLIS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I had not intended to discuss this paragraph in the river and harbor bill relating to the improvement of the Lower Mississippi River; and yet, in view of some things which have been said, I desire to say a very few words in regard to this provision of the bill. I well remember the creation of this Mississippi River Commission. It was created at a time when on both sides of this Hall almost everybody seemed to vie with each other in their zeal and earnestness for the improvement of that important river of the country.

I think I can say that I was not originally pleased with the idea of a Mississippi River commission; and I would rather to-day, so far as I am personally concerned, that the improvements of that river had been left, as we have left all the other rivers of the country, under the control of the Secretary of War and the Engineering Department. But it was a great and perplexing problem as to what we should do with the river, and it was thought wise to constitute a commission of eminent engineers who would investigate and study the character of the river, and then report some plan for its permanent improvement.

If it be said that there has been no such plan yet reported, I answer that that is because of the difficulties in the way of determining what the plan shall be. But that commission was constituted; and they have gone on and expended a considerable amount of money in carrying out their plan, so far as they have developed one; and since the commission was appointed there have been two committees of investigation sent down there, one by the House of Representatives and the other by the Senate. The House committee, of which I believe the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was chairman, went down the river from the mouth of the Ohio to the Head of the Passes and examined it and made a report upon the subject, which, as I remember, did not recommend a discontinuance of the work of the commission.

Two years and more since a committee of the Senate, of which Senator LOGAN, of my own State, was the chairman, took a steamboat and made the entire trip of the Lower Mississippi River, and certainly a portion of the Upper Mississippi, making a thorough investigation of the river, examining witnesses, and inspecting the work, as it had been done and was in progress. When that committee came back they made their report, which I have in my hand. I ask the House to remember that this was only two years ago; and there has been but one river and harbor bill passed by Congress since their report; and I now read the recommendation of that committee, after their examination and thorough investigation:

In view, however, of the good work already done by them—and the manifest results achieved, and the reasonable hopes of fresh benefits to general navigation, commerce, and trade to be derived, it is recommended that the sum of $1,000,000 be appropriated for the improvement of the river between Cairo and the mouth of the Illinois River, one million between the mouth of the Illinois River and Saint Paul, and for the improvement of the river between Cairo and the Head of the Passes such sum of money as has been named by the Mississippi River Commission in their report to the Secretary of War now before the Senate as being necessary for the further prosecution of the work going on in that direction under their supervision.

That is the report signed by Senators JOHN A. LOGAN, JOHN P. JONES, PHILETUS SAWYER, B. F. Jonas, and J. D. Walker; and instead of being a condemnation of the action of the Mississippi River Commission, it is unquestionably a favorable report, made after actual personal investigation and examination of the work of the commission. And, Mr. Chairman, I know some of the men on that committee well, and do not believe they would have reported favorably if they had found that the work was not satisfactory. On the contrary, I believe they would have recommended that it be discontinued if it had not been progressing satisfactorily to at least a reasonable degree. But instead of doing that, the committee really recommended the appropriation of several millions of dollars to continue the work.

But I have said that I was not personally favorable to the creation of this commission, and would have preferred that the Mississippi River, like our other rivers, had been left under the control of the Engineer Department. But Congress constituted that commission, and it is composed of gentlemen some of whom I know and in whom I have great confidence. General Gillmore, for instance, whom I know personally, is a gentleman of high character and an able engineer. General Comstock is perhaps the most conservative of the members of the commission, and is certainly an able engineer. And it does not seem wise to me now to discontinue the commission before they have made a fair test of such plans as they have developed for the improvement of the river.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have not appropriated in this bill what the Mississippi River Commission have asked for, nor have we appropriated even 50 per cent. of what they have asked for, and, while a great deal is said in regard to limiting this appropriation, and this amendment proposes to limit it, I believe I can say that the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors regard the appropriation contained in this bill in itself a limitation upon the work of the commission, and that it confines the commission to the portions of the river which have been referred to, and which are known as the Lake Providence reach and the Plum Point reach, two of the most dangerous reaches perhaps upon the river.

I think the commission, if they are at all honest and disposed to carry out the work as they have themselves contemplated, would not be justified under this appropriation in entering upon any new reach of the river, but will confine their work to the reaches where the work is now in progress, namely, the Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches. I can say further, Mr. Chairman, that I have regarded the improvement of the Lower Mississippi River as to a great extent experimental, although this commission seem to think otherwise. The members of the Senate committee, who are probably more capable of giving an opinion upon the subject than I am, for they examined the river and the work of the commission personally, and they reported recommending a large appropriation to continue the work.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Whether it has gone beyond the reach of experiment or not, it has not gone beyond the reach of floods.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Maine has made that suggestion, for I wanted to make a remark upon that subject. I know that this outlet system has been constantly brought before Congress by a gentleman living on the Lower Mississippi, a gentleman in whose honesty I have confidence. We have had it brought before us and urged year after year, but in my judgment that is not a question of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River at all; it is a question of relieving the people of the Lower Mississippi from the injuries which they sustain from floods.

Mr. WILLIS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. In that respect, Mr. Chairman, it might be well to try the experiment of outlets, and I have no sort of objection to it from that point of view, but I do not believe it would improve the navigation of the river. On the contrary, I believe that wherever you made an outlet you would find some difficulty in the way of navigation arising from it, for, as the engineers say, the full volume of water is sometimes necessary for the purpose of scouring the bed of the river, getting proper depth of channel, and removing obstructions which sometimes form where currents diverge or wherever currents come in contact with each other.

Mr. Chairman, before taking my seat I wish to say that I think one great difficulty with some members of the House arises from the fact that they do not give sufficient thought and investigation to these questions. If they would give more attention to them I feel certain they would not entertain some opinions which have been expressed on this floor in regard to many provisions of this bill.

I believe one great want of our country to-day is more eminent hydraulic engineers, engineers who better understand the nature of hydraulics, and who would be better prepared to recommend improvements of our rivers. But we will grow to that after a while and need not discuss it to-day.

I think, sir, that the navigation of the Mississippi River, which flows through one of the most wonderful valleys perhaps in the world, so far at least as regards its vast resources and the intelligent, enterprising, industrious population that inhabit it, is a question of so much importance that we can afford to experiment at even very considerable cost in order to arrive at a proper system of improvement, if one indeed can be found. But I believe the appropriation contained in this bill is intended to confine and will confine the operations of the commission to the work on Lake Providence and Plum Point reaches.

Mr. BURROWS. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him one question. If this appropriation is intended to limit the commission, as the gentleman says, to these two reaches (and that restriction being intended they will not, if they are honest, enter upon any other work), what objection is there to this amendment?

Mr. KING. Whose time does this come out of?

Mr. BURROWS. Out of the time of the whole committee. If the Chair will recognize me, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois that he may answer my question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to add only a word to this discussion by way of expressing my own wishes in regard to this river and harbor bill. There is an opinion prevalent all over the United States, outside of interested districts, that the appropriation for the Lower Mississippi is a fraud upon the people, that it is not an honest proposition. This belief owes its existence to the fact that there is a constant conflict of opinion between engineers as to the propriety of the plans of the Mississippi River Commission—a constant difference of opinion on the question whether any improvement has been made there. In consequence of this diversity of judgment, and a recollection that in times past the riparian owners thought it of sufficient advantage to their lands to do the very work that is now demanded of the Congress of the United States, the opinion has grown up among the people that this scheme to levee the banks of the Mississippi River under the guise of improving the navigation is a false pretense, to avoid the bald claim in Congress that the Government of the United States ought to protect those lands in the interest of private individuals.

I do not believe there is any man in the United States, apart from those directly interested and whose judgments are influenced by that interest, who believes that the building of levees along the Mississippi River is with the intent to improve the navigation. I desire here to utter a warning. In the last Congress the river and harbor bill failed to become a law because gentlemen insisted that this class of improvements should continue to be made and that the limitation contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana should not be adopted. I warn gentlemen that a cyclone will strike Congress sooner or later unless they consent to that kind of a limitation. The people of this country and their Representatives will not much longer permit an appropriation to be made under the cover of improving rivers and harbors which is in fact intended for private benefit. It was this, Mr. Chairman, that I desired to say. I am in favor of legitimately improving all rivers and harbors, but I am not in favor, under the guise of such improvement, of enhancing the value of private property. Everywhere there are little streams, not navigable, which in high water overflow their banks and destroy the property of individuals. It makes no difference whether the stream be small or large; if Congress is to protect riparian owners in one place it ought to protect riparian owners everywhere.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield five minutes to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment is so just to the people of this country that I am surprised there should be any opposition to it. Indeed until I examined the bill carefully I had no doubt a provision of this kind was incorporated in it. I knew there had been a Mississippi River committee and this committee had made its report in the Forty-seventh Congress. I knew the committee recommended that the expenditure should be confined until completion to two reaches—Plum Point and Lake Providence; and I had no doubt until I examined the bill that such a restriction would be found there.

On reading the bill, however, I failed to find any provision of that kind. A few days ago when the discussion was going on and the assertion was being made, as I thought, by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] that the restriction was in the bill, I put to him the question whether it was or was not; and he answered me distinctly that it was. I find his answer in the RECORD of the 29th instant at page 3949. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] had, I suppose, searched in vain in the bill for this restriction as I had; and he also put the question, and the answer was clearly made that it was in the bill. It certainly is not in the bill. It seems the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] would be content if it were there—would be glad if it were there.

It seems to have been about half understood by the committee—so at least some of them profess—that the expenditure should be restricted to these two points; but in order that there may be no mistake the gentleman from Indiana has offered his amendment. Why shall it not go into the bill? Is it the intention that we shall be deceived in appropriating this large sum of money? After we have expended $4,000,000 upon one of these reaches, without its having been completed, without its having been placed even in such a condition that the country may know the plan is a success, are we still to go on distributing money over the whole length of the river from the Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio, without knowing whether the work is a benefit to navigation or not? If this scheme is insisted upon, if it is insisted that this bill shall pass without the amendment, are we not justified in saying that it is in contemplation that this money shall be expended to build up the levees to protect the property of persons along the Mississippi River and not to improve its navigation?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] took occasion to-day in the debate on this bill to pay me a compliment, left-handed though it was, and I desire to say in return for the favor that, in my opinion, he has not merely contributed to this discussion "contradictions," but has brought to it much of ability and more of courtesy.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said here by gentlemen on that side of "false pretenses." Surely gentlemen who make that assertion will give us of the lower river valley credit for as much honesty of purpose and purity of motive for our acts on this floor as they claim for themselves. I come, it is true, from the Southwestern section of the country, through which the great Mississippi flows, but this river does not touch my Congressional district by more than 100 miles. And I believe I can be just as free in my judgment upon this question as any gentleman over there who has seen fit to charge us with false pretenses in our advocacy of this appropriation for the Mississippi.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which restricts the expenditure of money appropriated for the lower stretch of river to Lake Providence and Plum Point reaches. I will answer the reasons the gentleman gave for that amendment by quoting the language of a gentleman far more capable of speaking on this subject than I am, and he is the president of the Mississippi River Commission himself.

General Gillmore, the president of the commission, has no interest whatever in the lower valley or in the upper valley of the Mississippi. He does not live in the valley of the river. He is an officer in the Army of the United States, and surely no gentleman on this floor can, with justice, impugn his motives as interested in reference to what he says about the Mississippi River.

I ask the House to hear what he says on the subject of restricting the work of the commission to the two reaches named in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

There seems to be no just ground for apprehension that the ultimate cost of this improvement will be inordinately great, or will exceed what the Government will be fully justified in expending upon a great national work, in the success of which so large and so varied interests are involved. In order, however, that the increased depths already secured upon two reaches of bad navigation may be utilized or made of some practical value, the improvement should be extended up stream and down. Indeed, it can not be said that the navigation has received any practical benefit whatever so long as the improvements are restricted to localities hemmed in by bad river above and below. It might be better, were no middle course left open, to spread each appropriation judiciously over all the six reaches of bad navigation selected for improvement below Cairo, adding little each year, if practicable, to the available depths of the worst bars, than to confine the work to the Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches even, even if the low-river navigation of these two localities should be rapidly deepened to 20 feet, and the feasibility of the commission's plan thereby fully demonstrated. The objective point is the improvement of the river, and not the vindication of the agents employed on the work, except as means to the end.

That opinion of General Gillmore is concurred in by all the members of the Mississippi River Commission except Colonel Comstock. Who are these gentleman composing the commission? Three of them are Army engineers—Gillmore, Comstock, and Suter—no one of whom lives or has any interest in the valley of the Mississippi. Is not theirs a disinterested judgment of the river? Another is Professor Henry Mitchell, of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, whose home is, I believe, in New England. Is his judgment of the river warped by any interest? One of the civilian members of the commission is Robert S. Taylor, of Indiana, a gentleman whose surroundings would not indicate his judgment of the lower river in the treatment to be applied to it is or would be influenced by private interests (for he has none there) or local benefit to the people. The other two gentlemen are Messrs. Ferguson and Harrod, one of whom lives in Mississippi and the other in Louisiana. So that of the seven members of the commission two only live on the river or in its valley.

Now, here is a commission of scientific men who, after years of study of the river, state they have come to the deliberate judgment that it is not well that Congress should limit to the two reaches indicated the expenditure of money as proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

Plum Point reach, when they began to improve that 220 miles of river, had at low water a least depth of from 4 to 5 feet. There is now there at the lowest stages of water, as the result of this improvement, not less than 12 feet of water.

At Lake Providence reach, a stretch of the river over 200 miles long, there was when this improvement commenced a least depth at low water of 5 feet. There is to-day at the lowest stages of water during the season of low water not less than from 12 to 15 feet of water.

These are the actual practical results obtained by this commission, and demonstrate that their plan of improvement is a success.

Mr. Chairman, with reference to the construction of levees, no gentleman on this floor from the lower river has ever advocated, in connection with a river and harbor bill, the expenditure of a single dollar in the building of levees for the protection of private property, but only as a part of the system of improvement devised for the river by this scientific body, the river commission.

It is the opinion of a majority of the commission that in time of bank-overflow levees exert a direct action in deepening the channel and enlarging the bed of the river, and they are regarded as a desirable adjunct in the general system of improvement of the river. Because they are upon a large portion of the river essential to prevent destruction of life and property by overflow is no argument that they should not be erected by the General Government, but an additional reason why they should be constructed. They give "safety and ease to navigation, and facilitate commerce and trade by establishing banks or landing-places above the reach of floods, upon which produce can be placed while awaiting shipment and where steamers and other river craft can land in times of high water."

On this point, and with reference to the plan of the commission, I ask one moment to read from the testimony of Professor Clemens Herschell, one of the most distinguished and scientific engineers in this country, living in Massachusetts, and who will be vouched for if need be, I have no doubt, by every Representative on this floor from that great State. In the investigation made by the Burrows committee, in 1883, Mr. Herschell, in response to questions put to him with reference to the plan of the improvement of the Mississippi River, stated as follows:

Q. Have you had occasion to investigate the plans of improvement proposed by the present Mississippi River Commission?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you seen any of its works?
A. No, sir.
Q. Is their plan a new one, or is it an old plan?
A. I should say the general features of the plan were old; but the means and methods used by them in carrying out their works present a great many novel features, and to my mind valuable ones. I think they have gone ahead of what has been hitherto accomplished in that line, and are making progress in that branch of engineering work.
Q. What do you understand to be their theory?
A. Practically, what I stated a short time ago. For that part of the river which is troubled by shoals, to improve the navigation by having a defined high-water as well as low-water channel, one within the other; confine the waters of the stream, train it, and thereby cause it to excavate its own channel, having a channel of proper and reliable depth at all seasons of the year. These training works are built out from the shore, and they include in certain cases widening some parts of the river, other parts contracting; but the object sought to be obtained is to obtain a regular systematic channel, which the river is to be kept in, and which it will maintain of its own accord.

Here is, from an eminent disinterested scientific source, an emphatic indorsement of the levee system and channel-contraction system of the improvement of the river as inaugurated and prosecuted by the commission.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee will be kind enough to yield five minutes to me I will transfer the time to my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], and then he will have five minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly, if the gentleman desires it I will yield to him, but I wish to yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then, of course, you will have no time remaining.

Mr. KING. Will this extend the time of debate?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. KING. That will exhaust all the time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Continuing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I desire to answer the assertion which has been made repeatedly on this floor that nowhere have any estimates ever been made of the ultimate cost of these improvements. Bear in mind, sir, that the Mississippi River Commission has jurisdiction over the river from the Des Moines Rapids to its mouth, a distance of 1,500 miles. Now upon that river since 1879, when the river commission was organized, during a period of seven or eight years, there has been appropriated by Congress only a little more than $8,000,000. I submit to this committee and to the country that this is not a large expenditure, running as it does over a period of seven or eight years, for 1,500 miles of this great river, the "Father of Waters."

But, sir, to the allegation that nowhere has there ever been an estimate of the ultimate cost of this work, I desire to call the attention of the House to the report made by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. THOMAS, and by Mr. Ellis, of Louisiana, from the Select Committee on the Mississippi River, appointed at the close of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, which report was made in 1883. They say:

That the expenses will be great, exceeding in all probability the sum of $50,000,000, is true. But it must be remembered that the Government gave away to private parties for railroad purposes the enormous sum of $150,000,000; that the river route to the markets of Europe can be reached with a clear gain to the farmer of the West of 15 cents per bushel on every bushel of his grain, and that unless the Mississippi River be made safe and navigable the Western producer is absolutely in the power of the longitudinal lines of railroads.

There is one other view of this question which we desire to present. The $50,000,000 to be expended will be appropriated, perhaps, through a series of twenty-five years. In this way it will be a burden so light as hardly to be felt by the people of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend from Kentucky has yielded, I understand, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] five minutes. I yield him five minutes more, making ten minutes in all.

Mr. HISCOCK. This bill, so far as it appropriates money for the Lower Mississippi, more distinctly than any bill heretofore reported that I have had my attention called to, directly commits the Government to the expenditure of money solely for the benefit of private parties.

Take the appropriation for the New Orleans Harbor. This bill carries an appropriation of $100,000 for that purpose. The report estimates that for the completion of the work there nearly $700,000 will be required, and urges as a reason for it, and the only reason for it, that one and a half million of dollars, or a little under that amount, of private property will be protected. There is no question made that there is water enough there. The only argument urged by this report in favor of the appropriation is that nearly one and a half millions of private property will be protected.

Now, sir, I do not recall that in any bill that we have had here before has the attempt so clearly and pointedly been made to appropriate money from the Treasury for the benefit of private individuals. More than that; all this money, all this property that this bill proposes to protect for these private individuals is property to-day used for docking purposes and for which the private owners are receiving valuable rents. And this bill comes here and commits this Government to the expenditure of nearly $700,000 for the protection of one million and a half of private property that these people, individual owners, may be protected in the rents they are receiving for it. I ask my friend who has charge of this bill, is there any principle in the world upon which you can defend that? Fifty per cent. of the value of the property is appropriated here to protect that property.

Now, sir, there is one other suggestion I have to make in regard to this bill. I could vote for it perhaps if it protected private property if the private property was enough in its extent to compensate for the expenditure. But here is a bill, as I charge, deliberately in the interest not even of private parties, but in the interest of the contractors that build the boats, that furnish materials for these embankments, for these mattresses. I have not the time here to point out the small amount of this money that is devoted to any other purpose than to the payment of the contractors that have furnished the materials, that have furnished the boats, that have furnished this vast fleet that is controlled by the Mississippi River Commission. We have the highest authority, as high authority as there is on the floor of this House, in my judgment, or in the country, making the statement that every single dollar of this money is to be squandered, that $150,000,000 are pledged to this work, every dollar of which is to be wasted.

I have before me, Mr. Chairman, the expression upon this question, as I have stated, of one of the most distinguished authorities that I have ever heard discuss the question, an authority to whom every member of this House will bow. I do not think the gentleman from Louisiana or any other of the gentlemen from Louisiana will contradict him or gainsay what he says on the question. Speaking of the present plan for the improvement of the Mississippi River he says:

They forced an eminent civil engineer off the commission; and they have now a plan of operations sketched out to spend, as stated, $150,000,000. The calculation is a very plain one.

Mr. KING. I will answer that by a flat contradiction.

Mr. HISCOCK. He goes on:

And there is not in any of their work a guarantee that it will last twelve months.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will go on further and read a little more from this same authority:

And their calculations are, in round numbers, that the system will cost $150,000 a mile, and there are nearly a thousand miles of the Mississippi River in this condition, and it has two sides to it, and one side is always caving in where the other is forming a bar; you have, I say, a thousand miles at $150,000 a mile, making an aggregate of $150,000,000; and yet they can not point us to any experiment in this departure from the original plan and from reason showing that it will stand twelve months after a single rise.

Mr. KING. As the gentleman from New York has alluded to me I think it is fair he should allow me to answer.

A MEMBER. Whose statement is that?

Mr. HISCOCK. A gentleman asks me whose statement it is I have read. It is the statement of a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the last Congress, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKENRIDGE]. With all his sympathies warmly enlisted in favor of this work he, upon this floor, denounced the work; he denounced the plans under which it was being done, and said we had no guarantee it would stand after the first rise. Yet the Committee on Rivers and Harbors appropriated nearly $3,000,000 for the further prosecution of the work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is not in the interest of internal improvements. It is not to perfect or to make better or to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River. To some extent it is to protect private property, but in the main it is to buy material to be placed in the river to be washed out by the next freshet.

It is to hire steamboats; it is to build steamboats; it is to pay salaries; it is to be expended in the different Congressional districts of gentlemen upon this floor, I suppose for the purpose of popularizing themselves at home and in their States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. How long a time have I had, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed ten minutes. There now remain four minutes to each side.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the Chair that by a mathematical calculation we have seven minutes, if I am not mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has endeavored to keep the time correctly. There now remain four minutes to each side.

Mr. HISCOCK. And, Mr. Chairman, how little do we ask of these gentlemen, our masters, who have brought in this bill? We simply ask that two reaches upon the Mississippi River may be selected upon which this money may be expended and this scheme tested; but we are told that that can not be done; that it must be left to the Mississippi River Commission to scatter the money along up the river in the interest of contractors and of the owners of private property. Nearly all the gentlemen who are interested in the river and harbor bill—I regret to be compelled to say it—nearly all those gentlemen find their local appropriations strung upon this Mississippi River improvement, and so are practically forced to vote for a scheme which I do not believe they believe in, for the purpose of securing the appropriations for their respective localities.

I appeal to gentlemen upon the other side to say if this is fair treatment of men who are honestly in favor of a system of internal improvements? With these great objections to this bill, with these vast sums of money expended in the past—and you can not point to any substantial benefit derived from that expenditure—with these estimates of fabulous sums to be expended in the future upon this work, I ask if it is fair to bring in a bill here containing this item around which are clustered all these other appropriations for rivers and harbors, and say to the men who are honestly in favor of a liberal system of appropriations for internal improvements and who desire to take care of the works in their own districts, that those enterprises are to be strangled unless they will accept with their local appropriations this one for the Lower Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIS. I am exceedingly surprised at the remarks that have just fallen from the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. Upon what authority does he say that either the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or this Committee of the Whole propose to vote for an appropriation in this bill in which they have no faith? Who gave him that information?

Mr. HISCOCK. Did not the gentleman report a river and harbor bill last year which proposed substantially to abolish the river and harbor commission?

Mr. WILLIS. The Mississippi River Commission was created by the Congress of the United States after full and deliberate consideration of the needs of that river. That commision has been in existence but six years, and now what is proposed? That a commission thus created by act of Congress, composed of the most distinguished scientists and engineers of this or any other country, shall be stricken down because, forsooth, this great river has not by some instantaneous process been put in complete possession of its forces. Is that statesmanlike? Is that common sense? This committee has been engaged in making a scientific survey of the river, its topography, its hydrography, its necessities, the plan upon which the improvement should be made. It has been engaged in making preparation for that great work. It has expended a large sum of money, ay, one-sixth of the amount which we have given it, in preparation for the work, and now when it is ready and when the reports prove the plan a success, it is proposed to strike that commission down even just as a real beginning has been made.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman desire me to answer the question that he asked me a moment ago?

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman says that this improvement is for the benefit of private interests. It is no more for private interests than the improvement of New York Harbor, or the improvement of Newtown Creek, for which we have appropriated hundreds of thousands of dollars. It was proved before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that there were private interests to the amount of twenty millions on that creek that would be benefited by its improvement; but we do not improve it because those interests are there and we do not refuse to improve it because those interests are there. In appropriating for the improvement of that creek, or that arm of the sea, we had no regard for the private interests clustering around New York, and so in like manner we make this appropriation without reference to the private interests that may possibly be benefited by the work that is done for the improvement of navigation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a single question?

Mr. WILLIS. I can not. I yielded five minutes to the gentleman a while ago.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a single question?

Mr. WILLIS. I yielded the gentleman five minutes——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCCREARY). The hour of 5 o'clock has arrived, and debate is closed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky this question, whether the money to be expended at New Orleans Harbor is for any other purpose than to protect private property?

Mr. WILLIS. If the House will give me two minutes I desire to answer the gentleman from the report of the commission. The gentleman's argument is that there has been no report in favor of this levee system——

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not talking about the merits of the levee system now. I would like the gentleman to reply to my inquiry. Is there any suggestion anywhere that the money asked for New Orleans Harbor is for any other purpose than to protect private property?

Mr. WILLIS. I answer the gentleman that there is.

Mr. HISCOCK. Where is it?

Mr. WILLIS. There is proof, full and ample, in the report of the engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The only thing now in order is to vote on amendments. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has unanimous consent been given that those who have made remarks may extend them in the RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that has already been done.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Does the arrival of this hour, 5 o'clock, preclude the introduction of additional amendments?

Mr. WILLIS. I will state, if the Chair will permit me, that I do not understand this order as cutting off any amendment; it simply cuts off debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The present chairman was not in the chair at the time when this order was made; but his recollection is that the order does not preclude the offering of further amendments, but only cuts off further debate.

Mr. DAWSON. I send to the Chair an amendment.

Mr. DAWSON addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there are several amendments pending. After they are disposed of the amendment just sent up by the gentleman from Missouri will be read. The question is first upon an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which the Clerk will read.

Insert after the word "commission," in line 1123, the following:

"Provided, That the money appropriated by this act for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, except so much thereof as it shall be necessary to expend in preventing the works in progress on other portions of the river from waste and injury, shall be expended in the continuation and completion of the works on the Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches of the river, now in progress of improvement, as established by the Mississippi River Commission, to the end that the proposed improvement of said two reaches of the river on which the works are in progress shall be completed at an early day, and the plan of said commission for the improvement of the navigation of the river fully tested.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 71, noes 81.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to give us a yea-and-nay vote in the House on this proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there can be a yea-and-nay vote in the House I withdraw my point.

Mr. WILLIS. That is all right.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that there shall be a yea-and-nay vote in the House I withdraw the point that no quorum voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum has been withdrawn and——

Mr. HOLMAN. It is only withdrawn upon the condition that a yea-and-nay vote shall be taken upon the proposition in the House.

Mr. KING. I do not agree to that. I call for a count by tellers.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand the proposition has been already agreed to; and I submit the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] is now too late. The proposition was agreed to by both sides.

Mr. WILLIS. So far as the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has the right to agree to anything, he does agree to that.

Mr. BURROWS. I think that ought to be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can do no more than simply announce the statement which has been made. On this question the ayes were 71, the noes 81; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point that no quorum had voted was withdrawn, and the gentleman from Kentucky assented——

Mr. WILLIS. There is no possibility of any mistake. The point was made that there was no quorum, and thereupon——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I believe there was a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of no quorum was made, and then it was proposed that there should be a vote on the proposition in the House.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no dispute about the matter at all.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my call for tellers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Unanimous consent, then, is given that there may be a vote in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is understood that there shall be a yea-and-nay vote on this question in the House.

Mr. DUNN. Say "a vote in the House"—such as the House shall determine.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is agreed that the amendment shall be voted on in the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand this agreement goes upon the record. I understood the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to say he could not announce the understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. There will be a record of it.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is all we ask; we know it will be lived up to.

Mr. WILLIS. If I have any control of the matter, the agreement shall be carried out.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is upon an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "Mississippi River Commission" and "commission" wherever they occur in the paragraph on pages 47 and 48 of the bill, and insert "Secretary of War."

Mr. WILLIS. I raise the point of order that we have voted on this. It is identical with a proposition submitted by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PETERS. I understand we are to have a vote in the House upon that.

Mr. WILLIS. That was the understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIS. It was that this proposition has been already voted upon by the committee. Moreover, as a matter of perfect fairness, I will state that a vote was reserved in the House upon it, and it is only wasting the time of the committee to demand a quorum now.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is the understanding it is not necessary to have a vote on this amendment, and without objection the Clerk will read the next one.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the next amendment, proposed by Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, as follows:

At the end of line 1152 add: "Provided, That a committee, to consist of five members of the House, shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the work of the Mississippi River Commission and to report thereon before the end of the session, with such recommendation as it may deem proper. Said committee shall also examine and report upon the jetties at the mouth of the river, and especially whether mud lumps are forming beyond the jetties and what depth of channel is kept open at and beyond the mouth of the river."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 1127 to 1130, inclusive, as follows:
"Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to repair and build levees if, in their judgment, it should be done as part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 36, noes 86.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No quorum.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the same suggestion as to a vote in the House would save time on this amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Give us a yea-and-nay vote in the House on the amendment and I will withdraw the demand for a quorum.

Mr. WILLIS. Let us take a vote by tellers. There are so many yea-and-nay votes ordered that we will get into confusion, I fear.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, and Mr. WILLIS were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 130.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read the next amendment, offered by Mr. BUTTERWORTH, as follows:

Add at the end of line 1130 the following:
"And provided further, That this appropriation shall not be available for any improvement other than the removal of obstructions from, and the dredging of, said river, and the completion of unfinished works thereon the discontinuance of which would, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, work a material injury to commerce, until the plan of such improvement, with estimates of the expense thereof, shall have been submitted to the President and by him approved, and then only to the extent, to be designated by him, necessary for the improvement thus having his approval."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The next amendment, proposed by Mr. DAWSON, was read, as follows:

Amend line 1120 by striking out the words "two hundred and fifty" and inserting "five hundred," and by inserting after "dollars" the words "of which five hundred thousand shall be expended upon the New Madrid reach."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For examinations and surveys at South Pass of the Mississippi River, pursuant to the act of March 3, 1875, $10,000.

To which Mr. BUTTERWORTH offered an amendment, as follows:

To come in after the word "five," in line 1155:
"And the Secretary of War shall cause soundings to be made for a distance of not less than 5 miles beyond the jetties at the mouth of the river to ascertain whether mud lumps are forming and to what extent bars are forming and what depth of channel is maintained all the way to the deep waters of the Gulf, and to report the results of such examination to Congress at the next session."

Mr. WILLIS. I only desire to say that if the gentleman had examined the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico, which is on exhibition at the National Museum, he would find there 2 miles depth of water when he reaches that point.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. And the law already provides for it.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, as follows:

For survey of the Mississippi River from the Head of the Passes to its headwaters: Continuing survey, $75,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Before leaving the paragraph under consideration I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentlemen from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of lines 1132 and 1133 the following words: "One hundred thousand dollars are to be expended in continuing the work in progress at New Orleans."

Mr. WILLIS. I make the point of order that this paragraph is already passed.

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not know, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk had begun upon another paragraph of the bill. I was standing waiting to offer this amendment under the impression that he had just been reading another amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. I shall not insist upon the point of order.

The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. HEPBURN, the committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For gauging the waters of the Lower Mississippi River and its tributaries, as provided for in joint resolution of the 21st of February, 1871, $5,000.

For continuing the removal of snags, wrecks, and other obstructions in the Mississippi River, $75,000.

For gauging the waters of the Columbia River, $1,000.

Mr. LITTLE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:
"If, during the first ten days of the session or sessions of Congress after the passage of this act, the President shall be satisfied that it would be detrimental to the public interests or a wasteful or unwarrantable expenditure of public money to apply any specific appropriation herein, or unexpended balance thereof, exceeding $25,000 in amount, to the purpose or purposes for which appropriated, he shall direct the withholding of the same from use, and forthwith transmit to the House of Representatives a full statement of his reasons therefor. And thereupon, subject to the right of each House to determine the rules of its proceedings, the question of continuing such appropriation or unexpended balance thereof shall be submitted to the House of Representatives, and, if decided in the affirmative, shall be transmitted, together with said statement, to the Senate and submitted thereto. If the two Houses concur in continuing such appropriation or unexpended balance, the same shall thereupon again become available for said purpose or purposes; otherwise it shall be covered into the Treasury."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. It shall not be lawful to build any wharf, dolphin, boom, dam, weir, breakwater, bulkhead, jetty, or other structure outside of established harbor-lines, without the permission of the proper local authorities, in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, navigable river, or other waters of the United States, or in such manner as to obstruct or impair navigation, commerce, or anchorage of said waters; and it shall not be lawful hereafter to commence the construction of any bridge, bridge-draw, bridge piers or abutments, causeway, or other works over or in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, navigable river, or other waters of the United States, under any act of the Legislative Assembly of any State, until the location and plan of such bridge have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War, or to excavate or fill, or in any manner to alter or modify, the course, location, condition, or capacity of the channel of said navigable waters of the United States, unless approved and authorized by the Secretary of War: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any bridge, bridge-draw, bridge piers or abutments the construction of which has been heretofore duly authorized by law, or be so construed as to authorize the construction of any bridge, draw-bridge, bridge piers or abutments, or other works, under an act of the Legislature of any State, over or in any stream, port roadstead, haven, or harbor, or other navigable water not wholly within the limits of such State.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, strike out the words "proper local authorities" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Secretary of War."

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. I would suggest that many of these harbors are under the control of local authorities, harbor commissioners appointed by the different States, and this would deprive them of any authority to deal with such cases.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is just what I wish to avoid. The words "proper local authorities" might mean municipal authorities. I do not wish the municipal authorities of the city of Chicago to have anything to do with establishing harbor lines there.

Mr. WILLIS. That is what I understood to be the gentleman's object.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The local authorities have supervision of the construction of docks and piers, but ought not to be allowed to infringe upon the harbor. I fear that the language in the bill might be construed to give them that authority.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to ascertain which and how many, if any, of the navigable streams within the jurisdiction of the United States have been and are now improved by locks and dams, or by either, or by other improvements, either by States or by corporations in pursuance of State authority, and upon which streams and for the use of which improvements toll is now charged, and whether said improvements can be purchased or condemned by the United States, and the probable cost of each of said improvements, together with the probable benefit to navigation and commerce of such purchase or condemnation when made, with the view of making the navigation of such streams free; and that he report to the next Congress.

Mr. HEWITT. I move to strike out section 9, and I propose to discuss that amendment now unless the gentleman from Kentucky will yield for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent to pass over that section for the present, with authority to the gentleman from New York to go back to it, so that we may get to the end of the bill this evening.

Mr. HEWITT. I assent to that. I understand we will return to section 9 and that it may be discussed later.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the proposition? The Chair desires to understand it.

Mr. WILLIS. To save time I will state that we are willing that that section shall be omitted. The committee acquiesce in the motion to strike out.

The motion to strike out the section was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 10, as follows:

SEC. 10. The Secretary of War shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to secure a judicious and economical expenditure of said sums, and shall cause to be made and submitted to Congress annual reports, together with maps and plans, including the report of the Mississippi River Commission, on or before December 1, giving detailed statements of the work done, contracts made, the expenditures thereunder or otherwise, and balances of money on hand up to November 1, and the effect of such work, together with such recommendations as he may deem it proper to lay before Congress. He shall also, at the same time, report to Congress, at its next session, all the instances in the United States in which piers, breakwaters, or other structures or works built or made by the United States in aid of commerce or navigation are used, occupied, or injured by a corporation or an individual, and the extent and mode of such use, occupation, or injury, and the facts touching the same. He shall also report annually at the same time whether any bridges, causeways, or structures now erected or in process of erection do or will interfere with free and safe navigation.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In line 3, strike out the words "said sums" and insert in lieu thereof "the money herein appropriated."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the chairman of the committee if he will accept an amendment to insert the words "locks and dams" after the word breakwater," in line 13?

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer another amendment to that section, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18, section 10, after the word "same," insert "which reports shall be accompanied by the affidavit or affidavits of the person or persons charged with obtaining the foregoing information that the facts therein stated are true and correct."

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk proceeded to read section 13, as follows:

SEC. 13. The Secretary of War is hereby directed, at his discretion, to cause examinations or surveys, or both, to be made, and the cost of improvements to be estimated, at the following localities, to wit:

In the States of—

Mr. MCRAE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 13 by inserting after the words "in the States," in line 5, the following:

Arkansas:

Re-examination of Little River and lakes connecting with Red River between Shreveport and Fulton, Ark.

Re-examination of Ouachita above Camden, Ark.

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment just adopted the words "Saline River."

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was adopted.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors recommended the following amendment:

Strike out from line 6 to line 13 of section 13 as follows:

A resurvey of San Francisco Harbor, with a view to further improvement.

San Pablo Bay.

Suisun Bay.

The Strait of Carquinez.

Mouth of San Joaquin River.

Mouth of Sacramento River.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 19 insert as follows:

Connecticut:

Five-Mile River Harbor.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the amendment just adopted insert as follows:

Dakota Territory:

James River.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 25 insert:

Clear-Water Harbor, including Anclote and Saint Joseph Bays and the narrows into Boga Ciega, Wakulla River, from its mouth to Newport.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the amendment just adopted insert the following:

Survey of the channel from Haulover, on Indian River, to Gilbert's bar.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 30, insert:

"From Dubois Island to Dubois bar."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a verbal amendment in section 13, line 34, by striking out the word "at" and inserting the word "in," so that the line will read "Bars in Hamburg Bay."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting in line — the words "For ice harbor" at Paducah, Ky.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, after that amendment I wish to add the following: "Bar at mouth of Limestone Creek, harbor of Maysville."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAY. I move to amend, in line 49, by adding, after the words "Mississippi River," the words "by locks, and also Bayou Plaquemine and their connecting streams to form the best route to Grand Lake."

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding after the words "Calcasieu River," in line 51, the words "and affecting its outlet to the Gulf."

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move to amend, in line 55, after the word "dam," by inserting "Clear Lake, Black Bayou, Red Bayou, Black Lake, and Kelly Bayou, to reopen navigable communication between those streams and Red River."

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAY. I move to amend, in line 55, by adding after the last word "a permanent improvement to secure navigation in Bayou La Fourche at low water."

The amendment was agreed to.

An amendment recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, striking out, in line 56, the name "Little River," was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ouachita River, from Camden to mouth, with a view to slackwater navigation.

Mr. GAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting in line 59 the words "Bayou Vermillion, to secure navigation from Abbeville to the railroad bridge of the Louisiana and Texas Railroad."

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAY. I move to add after the amendment last adopted the words:

Surveys of the Mississippi River, to ascertain the comparative velocity of the current at various depths of the channel from the Head of the Passes for a distance of 100 miles up that stream.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. GAY. This provides for getting very important information.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have this objection to the amendment, that it does not come in at the proper place. The surveys of the Mississippi River are under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission. This would authorize the Secretary of War also to make surveys.

Mr. GAY. I withdraw the amendment.

Amendments proposed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, striking out in line 60 "Bayou Vidal," and in line 61 "Bayou Roundaway," were agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to correct a mistake of a letter in line 53, page 58 of the bill. The name "Fort Barre" should read Port Barre.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I move to insert after the heading "Maine," line

62 of the bill, the words "Bagaduce River between the towns of Penobscot and Brooksville."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend by inserting between lines 85 and 86 the words "New Bedford Harbor."

The amendment was agreed to.

An amendment recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, inserting in line 85 the name "Winthrop Harbor," was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. In line 93, under the head of "Michigan," there is provision for a survey at the "mouth of Black River." I move to insert after the words "Black River" the words "Saint Clair County." There are two Black Rivers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Carp River, with a view to affording an entrance to Carp Lake for harbor of refuge.

An amendment reported by the committee to insert after "Carp River" the words "at Leland" was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lake Michigan at Empire, with a view to cutting a channel across the bar from Lake Michigan to Carp Lake.

An amendment of the committee to strike out "Carp" and insert "Bar" was agreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to amend by inserting after the clause last read the following:

Grand Traverse Bay, with a view to connecting it with Torch Lake near Eastport.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether this contemplates the cutting of a canal?

Mr. CUTCHEON. It looks to connecting Torch Lake with Grand Traverse Bay. There is a natural connection; but the point contemplated in the amendment is not where the natural outlet is, though near it. The case here is the same as with a great many harbors on Lake Michigan.

Mr. DUNN. Does this amendment contemplate any benefit to private property?

Mr. CUTCHEON. The amendment has no reference at all to the benefit of private property. It looks to opening up a chain of lakes with more than a hundred miles of magnificent navigation. Three large and rich counties immediately interested in this navigation have by the unanimous vote of their boards of supervisors asked for this action.

Mr. WILLIS. I simply desired to know whether this was a proposition to cut a canal or whether there is now water there.

Mr. CUTCHEON. There is plenty of water there; but the amendment does not contemplate a connection at the exact point where the natural outlet of these lakes occurs. At the point proposed, however, the improvement can be more cheaply made than at the natural outlet, the distance across being much less than it would be if the natural outlet were improved.

It is proposed to open this connection with Torch Lake, a lake 20 miles long and deep enough to float our heaviest steamers. This improvement will open up a chain of five successive lakes, adjacent to which are magnificent hard-wood forests, and on the banks of one of these lakes is the largest blast-furnace in the State of Michigan, turning out 70 tons of iron a day.

Mr. WILLIS. With the understanding that this is not a proposition for an artificial canal, we have no objection. If it is, we do object. With this statement on the record I am willing to let the matter go.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I can not say that there is a natural water course at this particular point. But the case is the same here as with one-half the harbors upon Lake Michigan. The case is the same as at Frankfort, at Ludington, and at White River. In all these cases it is necessary to have an artificial channel cutting across these bars or spits, because this work can be more cheaply done than to improve the natural outlet.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I call for a division. I shall insist upon this amendment going in if we sit here all night. The bill makes provision for forty surveys in the State of Louisiana. In this case the distance from water to water is only about the eighth of a mile.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 23, noes 53.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I demand tellers.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope my friend will not do that.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will say to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that I have stood by him on this bill from the beginning to the end.

Mr. WILLIS. Then do not desert us now.

Mr. CUTCHEON. This is the first survey asked that has not been agreed to. You have put them on by the dozen. I simply ask for a survey; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order; the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. LONG. The gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to ask him a question: If provision for this survey should be inserted in the bill, will the Secretary of War even then be compelled to make the survey? Will not the matter still be within his discretion?

Mr. WILLIS. That is true. The only point in this matter (and it has been made over and over again) is as to the jurisdiction of this committee. We have held all along that we have no jurisdiction of either canals or railways.

Mr. LONG. This simply leaves the matter discretionary with the Secretary of War.

Mr. DAVIS. This survey will determine the fact whether this is a canal or not.

Mr. WILLIS. As there seems to be some difference of opinion about this case, and as this is merely a preliminary survey, no affirmative action being asked from the House, I will, so far as I am personally concerned, withdraw any objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan withdraw his demand for tellers?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do, provided the Committee of the Whole consents to this survey going in; not otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the question will be again taken on the amendment.

The question being again taken on the amendment of Mr. CUTCHEON, it was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Minnesota River, with a view to its improvement by locks and dams.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I move after line 108 to insert the following:

Tombigbee River, to ascertain what improvement is necessary to make said river continuously navigable from Vienna, Ala., to Walker's Bridge, Miss.

Mr. WILLIS. I suggest to my friend to say from Vienna, Ala., to the other point.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mississippi:
Cassity Bayou.
Noxubee River.
Amendment of the committee:
"Add the following: 'To ascertain whether it can be made continuously navigable by a system of locks and dams.' "

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARRY. I move after the word "dams" to insert the words "or otherwise."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to insert the following:

Bear Creek.

Mr. WILLIS. What State?

Mr. WHEELER. Alabama and Mississippi both.

Mr. WILLIS. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Missouri:
Resurvey of the Osage River from its mouth to Osceola, with a view to movable lock and dams, or other methods of improvement.
Amendments of the committee:
"Insert the following:
"'Little River from Hornersville to its junction with the Saint Francis River.
"'Saint Francis River from Greenville to the Arkansas State line.'"

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Channel between Jamaica Bay and Rockaway Inlet.

Mr. HEWITT. I move to insert the following:

The East River, with a view to the removal of the ledge of rocks situated between 500 and 600 feet from the foot of Tenth and Eleventh streets in the city of New York.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Niagara River between Black Rock and Tonawanda, with a view to a 16-foot channel.
Amendment of the committee:
"Insert before 'Niagara' the words 'Tonawanda Bay and.'"

Mr. WEBER. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "Bay" and inserting "Harbor."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Oregon:
Wood River.
Link River.
Suislaw River and Bar.

Mr. HERMAN. The correct spelling is Siuslaw, and not as it is in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The correction will be made accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows.

Ohio:
Sandusky Harbor, with a view to a straight channel from the north end of Cedar Point to the east end of the existing channel in front of the city.
Big Hockhocking River from its mouth to Coalville.

Amendments of the committee: Strike out "Coalville" and insert "Coolville;" and insert the following:

Chagrin River at its mouth.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

South Carolina:
Mosquito Creek between the South Edisto and Ashepoo Rivers, with a view to connect the South Edisto with the Ashepoo at or near Fenwick's Island.
Mingo Creek.
Clark's Creek.
Little Pee Dee River.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move to insert the following:

Alligator River and other waters connecting Santee River and Bull's Bay.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tennessee:
North Fork of the Forked Deer River below Dyersburg.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move the following amendment:

Obed River from the point where improvements have heretofore been made to the mouth of West Fork.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Texas:
Cedar Bayou where it empties into Galveston Bay.
Raft at the mouth of Guadaloupe River.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to insert after line 164 the following:

Colorado and Brazos.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I move to add the following:

Sabine River from Logansport down to its mouth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRIGG. I move after Nansemond River, in line 167, to insert:

Louisa Fork of Sandy River.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRADY. I move the following amendment:

Roanoke River, from Clarksville, Va., to Eden Falls, N. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to strike out the entire thirteenth section relating to these surveys. I do not want to take one minute of the committee's time if I can have a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

Mr. KING. What is the amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to strike out the entire section relating to these surveys. Do I understand I can have a yea-and-nay vote in the House. I desire to say this, and it will take me but a minute to say it.

Mr. KING. I rise to a point of order. I understood the debate was closed on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will take less time in the statement of my objections to this section of the bill, and my reason for making this motion, than it will take to overrule the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, I have already stated upon the floor of the House, and I desire now to repeat very briefly the objections I then made: The committee have within the last few minutes enlarged the number of new surveys provided for by this bill until they amount to about one hundred and forty in all. The last river and harbor bill passed by Congress contained one hundred and eight provisions for different surveys. Twenty-five per cent. of the surveys ordered in the last act are incorporated in this bill and that portion of it in which appropriations are made.

I believe that the viciousness of this whole system of legislation in connection with this bill rests largely upon this principle of enlarging the number of new works by authorizing these surveys in new places before the works already in progress are completed. That is all I desired to say.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman is entirely in error in regard to the effect of the last surveys authorized. I hold in my hand this bill, and I state to him and to the committee that so far as my examination extends, and I think I am quite familiar with the bill, the new projects do not amount to $50,000 in the bill.

These are merely preliminary surveys, and half of them never get beyond an examination on paper. The engineer examines his charts and says they are not worthy of improvement or are not of public necessity. But certainly any gentleman has the right to ask that a river in his State shall be inquired into by the Secretary of War to see whether it is worthy of improvement, and that is the extent of this section.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is not true that the effect of such a provision is often to prevent improper appropriations?

Mr. WILLIS. Of course; that is the object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to say just this in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, that I have not made any statement here without knowing that I made it upon authority. I have examined carefully and compared the present bill with the surveys previously authorized, and have compared the new improvements inaugurated by this bill with that passed by the last Congress so far as it relates to the improvements of rivers and harbors, and I know that twenty-three of those that were provided for in the bill of the last Congress for survey have been incorporated in this bill.

I did not state what the amount would reach in dollars and cents, but only the aggregate number of the surveys, for I have not examined what the total cost will be. But as to the number already undertaken I am correct in that.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, there were upon a division—ayes 14, noes 41.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No quorum.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the committee do now rise. We have reached that point in the bill where I intended to make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McCREARY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the river and harbor appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same; namely:

A bill (H. R. 1397) to establish a port of delivery at Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts; and

A bill (S. 1013) providing for the establishment of a port of entry at Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, State of Maine.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. DIBBLE, by consent heretofore granted, submitted the views of the minority of the Select Committee on the election of President and Vice-President on the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors for President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon; which was ordered to be printed, to accompany the report of the select committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, agreed to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. PIKE, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office inclosing communication from the surveyor-general of New Mexico relative to legislation for the adjustment of private land claims in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read twice, and referred to the committees named:

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution; which was read, and under the statute referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey showing the progress made in said survey during the year ended June 30, 1885, for distribution by said superintendent.

To Mr. CULBERSON, for twelve days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. CABELL, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR, for this day, on account of sickness in his family.

POTOMAC RIVER FLATS.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the part of the House in the conference with the Senate on the bill (S. 335) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River flats, in the District of Columbia, Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. REAGAN, and Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

TELEPHONE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 26, 1886.

"Resolved, That the sum of $1,000 allowed by the resolution of February 26, 1886, relating to certain telephone companies, to pay the expenses of the investigation thereby ordered, be increased to a sum not exceeding $2,500; that the additional sum hereby allowed be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, as provided in the original resolution, and that said committee be authorized to pay a clerk at the same rate of compensation allowed to other committee clerks, beginning at the date when he was actually employed in the service of the committee."

The committee make the following report:

That the Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, after due consideration, report the following substitute and recommend its adoption:

"Resolved, That the sum of $1,000 allowed by the resolution of February 26, relating to certain telephone companies, to pay the expenses of the investigation thereby ordered, be increased to a sum not exceeding $3,000; that the additional sum hereby allowed be paid out of the contingent fund of the House as provided in the original resolution, and that said committee is hereby declared to have been authorized by the resolution aforesaid to employ a clerk, and is authorized to pay said clerk at the same rate of compensation allowed to other committee clerks, beginning at the date when he was actually employed in the service of the committee."

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the development of that investigation has shown clearly that the committee need more than the sum originally allowed. We believe they need at least $3,000, and I suppose there will be no objection to the passage of the resolution. If any gentleman has any question to ask I will answer it, or allow the chairman of the investigating committee to answer it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we had better have some explanation of the necessity for this additional appropriation.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I state that the committee was authorized to employ a stenographer. The expense of the special stenographer up to a certain date was about $1,500. At that date, seeing that we had exceeded the amount allowed us, I called upon the Speaker and had one of the official stenographers detailed to record the proceedings of the committee, and since that time we have incurred no further expense of that character. The other expenses have been for mileage, for witnesses, and a very few dollars for stationery. The committee at the outset thought it might get along without a clerk, but soon found that to be impossible. On account of the number of papers which came into our custody, and the work connected with them, we found the services of a clerk absolutely necessary, and without express authority from the House, but assuming that we had the authority under the original resolution, we did employ a clerk, who has rendered service to the committee almost from its organization. I was under the impression when this resolution was offered that $2,500 would be sufficient for the purposes of the committee, and it may yet prove to be so, but we are authorized by the substitute reported from the Committee on Accounts to expend, if necessary, a sum not exceeding $3,000. We certainly will not expend more than is absolutely necessary to pay the expenses of the committee.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if no other gentleman desires to ask a question, I demand the previous question on agreeing to the substitute and the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The substitute reported by the Committee on Accounts was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The report was read, as follows:

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

"Whereas by a report to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury, bearing date April 5, 1886, it is shown that quite a number of persons holding positions as employés in the Treasury Department are carried on the rolls of employés and not required to perform any service, and whose places are filled by substitutes designated to positions within the classified civil service and who have not been certified for appointment to said positions by the United States Civil Service Commission, and who are paid a less rate of compensation than the salary allowed the said regular employés: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House by what authority these practices are had, and by what authority persons are paid salaries when they do not perform any service to the Government."

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom the above resolution was referred, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

The committee can see no reason for questioning the good faith of the statement made by the acting Secretary of the Treasury in his report to the House under date April 5, 1886, that substitutes are appointed to fill the places of permanent employés when the latter are absent on account of sickness, and accepting this as a valid reason for the temporary appointment of such substitutes, beg leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the matter.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adopt the resolution reported back by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] desire to address the Chair?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRISON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I will send to the Clerk's desk the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on which was based the resolution introduced by me. He need not read the accompanying table, but I will ask permission to print it in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 5, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted March 24, 1886, of which the following is a copy:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General be requested, respectively, to inform the House, if not incompatible with the public service, whether or not employés in their respective Departments are permitted to employ substitutes to perform their duties, and whether or not such substitutes are employed or appointed; and, if so, by whom so employed or appointed, and the amount of compensation paid such substitutes and by whom paid, and the amount of compensation paid the regular employés during the time such substitute is employed and by whom paid, together with a list of such employés, their home post-offices, and date of their appointment, and a list of such substitutes, their home post-offices, and date of their appointment, and whether or not any of such substitutes are assigned to duties of positions included in the classified civil service, and whether or not such substitutes have passed examinations by the United States Civil Service Commission and been certified for such appointment; and if such subemployment or subappointment is had or permitted, by what authority it is so had or permitted."

In reply thereto I would say that when employés of this Department are obliged to be absent on account of sickness, it has been customary to allow substitutes to act in their places if additional clerical force is required during their absence for the proper transaction of public business. The designation of such substitutes is made by the direction of this Department, and the substitutes so designated are compensated out of the regular salaries of the persons whom they represent. They perform such duties as may be required of them from time to time in the bureau or division to which they are attached.

This Department is not informed as to whether such substitutes have passed examination by the United States Civil Service Commission, as they are designated to said positions without certification from said commission.

Inclosed herewith is a list giving the names of such substitutes, their home post-offices so far as known to this Department, and date of their designation; also the names of the regular employés who are represented by said substitutes, their home post-offices, and the date of their appointment, together with the amount of compensation allowed said substitutes and the salaries of said employés.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. FINDLAY. I rise to a point of order. When the report of the committee had been made, I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] to move the adoption of the report——

The SPEAKER. Which was unnecessary.

Mr. FINDLAY. And the Chair submitted that question, which was voted on. I voted "ay" myself on the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] stated, however, that he had risen to address the Chair——

Mr. FINDLAY. But he failed to do so; and before making that statement he had moved the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. That was the matter before the House.

Mr. FINDLAY. What becomes of that matter?

The SPEAKER. It is pending. The gentleman still retained the floor.

Mr. FINDLAY. The question was put by the Chair to the House on the adoption of the report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The negative vote was not taken.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Kentucky stated that before the Chair commenced to take the vote he had risen to address the Chair. The Chair always accepts a statement of that kind made by gentlemen on the floor. The gentleman from Kentucky retained his place on the floor. The Chair commenced taking the vote because he supposed the gentleman from Kentucky did not desire to say anything; but the gentleman having stated that he did desire to speak, and being still on the floor, the Chair of course was compelled to suspend the putting of the question.

Mr. FINDLAY. I do not wish to press the matter further; but the "ayes" had been called for.

The SPEAKER. But the vote was interrupted by the statement of the gentleman that he had held the floor for the purpose of addressing the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. I beg leave to differ with the gentleman from Maryland as to what my motion was. It was to adopt the resolution, and not the report of the committee. The motion I desire to submit is that the report of the committee be laid on the table and the resolution as reported back be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion was to adopt the resolution; that was the language used by him. The Chair supposed he meant the report, because the Chair, having his attention engaged otherwise while the reading of the report was going on, did not know but that the committee had reported back the resolution with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. FINDLAY. I understood the gentleman to move the adoption of the report, not of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The stenographer's notes will show what took place.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to address the House on this resolution if the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service had reported it back favorably. But as it has come in with an adverse report, I feel called upon to assign some reason for advocating its adoption.

The committee to whom the resolution was referred appear to base their action on the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury in the report made April 5, 1886, in response to a similar resolution in which report, as read by the Clerk, it is stated by the Secretary of the Treasury that substitutes are appointed or designated in the Treasury Department in case of sickness. This report can not, if I understand the meaning of language, be construed as signifying that only in cases of sickness are substitutes appointed or designated. With the knowledge I have of the facts in the case I would be unwilling to place the Secretary of the Treasury in the attitude of saying that. While I do not personally know the facts in each of the cases in which substitutes have been designated, as given in the table submitted with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I do know enough about the facts in many of these cases to justify me in saying that such a statement would be unwarranted. I therefore conclude that the Secretary of the Treasury did not intend to be understood as saying that these substitutes were designated only in case of sickness on the part of the principal employé.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that for the purposes of this report, after the resolution in response to which it is given had reached the Treasury Department and been laid before the Secretary of the Treasury, appointees of the Treasury Department who had substitutes, and who were engaged in other business, were caused to report for duty and their substitutes dismissed. In addition to that, regulations were promulgated through the various bureaus of the Treasury Department changing the rate of compensation as between the principals and their substitutes; in orther words, limiting the margin of these office-brokers after the adoption of that resolution, for the purposes of this report.

I regard this, Mr. Speaker, as a very grave state of affairs. I consider it a matter which this House should act upon immediately. It is an abuse of public power, an abuse of the civil-service law, the investigation of which no man can afford to oppose in the face of these facts. We are committed, Mr. Speaker, to the faithful execution of the present civil-servcie law; and I want to state at the beginning of my remarks that I believe it to be a piece of hypocrisy. I have no faith in it—no patience with that kind of thing. I believe that the civil-service law was "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity;" that it was conceived in the mind of Dorman B. Eaton, who afterward made more money out of it than any other man, and that a "cat's-paw" was made of Senator Pendleton, for whom previous to his connection with that matter I entertained the highest regard and appreciation, but whose connection with that obnoxious measure relegated him to that obscurity which no man will envy him, and from which it will require extraordinary power to resuscitate him.

I start in with that statement, but while I have no patience with that law, while I believe it is an unjust law, I say, inasmuch as we are committed to its execution by the Chief Executive of this Government, by the man elected President by that party in whose faith and integrity I have the greatest confidence, we ought in good faith, inasmuch as it is the law of the land, to respect it. If we can not repeal it let us obey it, let us live up to it.

That is my doctrine. The more objectionable a law is, the more obnoxious it becomes by its faithful execution. If we have a bad law, the way to get rid of it is to enforce it. Then public sentiment will revolutionize in reference to it, and we can find relief through honest channels and methods.

One objection I might assign to this civil-service law which will illustrate the nature of many objections, and I might state more, but I will not consume the time of the House by going into detail. My objection is that we find prior to the adoption of the civil-service law that there was in force and on the statute-books this law. I read from the supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States, volume 1, laws 1874-'81, page 164, where, speaking of the provision in reference to appointees in the Treasury Department, it goes on to say as follows:

Provided, That on and after January 1, 1876, the appointments of this Department shall be so arranged as to be equally distributed between the several States of the United States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to population.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a well known fact that at the time this civil-service act went into effect this part of the statute had been ignored and that many of the States of this Union were not fairly represented on the rolls of public employés of this Government.

This may be regarded by some high-minded statesmen as a trifling matter to talk about, and whenever any one undertakes to call attention to the patronage of the Government he is stigmatized by gentlemen, said to be reformers of the civil service, as a spoilsman. If attaching importance to the public positions of the Government renders a man deserving of such accusation, we at least, who want a fair "go-down" and a fair division of these appointments among the population of the several States, deserve to bear it, and we have associated with us the President of the United States as well as many others high in authority.

I ask to print in connection with my remarks that part of the President's annual message touching on the civil-service law, in which he commends not only the importance of the law but the importance of its faithful execution. It is as follows:

The report of the Civil Service Commission, which will be submitted, contains an account of the manner in which the civil-service law has been executed during the last year, and much valuable information on this important subject.

I am inclined to think that there is no sentiment more general in the minds of the people of our country than a conviction of the correctness of the principle upon which the law enforcing civil-service reform is based. In its present condition the law regulates only a part of the subordinate public positions throughout the country. It applies the test of fitness to applicants for these places by means of a competitive examination, and gives large discretion to the commissioners as to the character of the examination and many other matters connected with its execution. Thus the rules and regulations adopted by the commission have much to do with the practical usefulness of the statute and with the results of its application.

The people may well trust the commission to execute the law with perfect fairness and with as little irritation as is possible. But of course no relaxation of the principle which underlies it, and no weakening of the safeguards which surround it can be expected. Experience in its administration will probably suggest amendment of the methods of its execution, but I venture to hope that we shall never again be remitted to the system which distributes public positions purely as rewards for partisan service. Doubts may well be entertained whether our Government could survive the strain of a continuance of this system, which upon every change of administration inspires an immense army of claimants for office to lay siege to the patronage of Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent.

The allurements of an immense number of offices and places, exhibited to the voters of the land, and the promise of their bestowal in recognition of partisan activity, debauch the suffrage and rob political action of its thoughtful and deliberative character. The evil would increase with the multiplication of offices consequent upon our extension, and the mania for office-holding, growing from its indulgence, would pervade our population so generally that patriotic purpose, the support of principle, the desire for the public good, and solicitude for the nation's welfare, would be nearly banished from the activity of our party contests and cause them to degenerate into ignoble, selfish, and disgraceful struggles for the possession of office and public place.

Civil-service reform enforced by law came none too soon to check the progress of demoralization.

One of its effects, not enough regarded, is the freedom it brings to the political action of those conservative and sober men who, in fear of the confusion and risk attending an arbitrary and sudden change in all the public offices with a change of party rule, cast their ballots against such a chance.

Parties seem to be necessary, and will long continue to exist; nor can it be now denied that there are legitimate advantages, not disconnected with office-holding, which follow party supremacy. While partisanship continues bitter and pronounced, and supplies so much of motive to sentiment and action, it is not fair to hold public officials, in charge of important trusts, responsible for the best results in the performance of their duties, and yet insist that they shall rely, in confidential and important places, upon the work of those not only opposed to them in political affiliation, but so steeped in partisan prejudice and rancor that they have no loyalty to their chiefs and no desire for their success.

Civil-service reform does not exact this, nor does it require that those in subordinate positions who fail in yielding their best service, or who are incompetent, should be retained simply because they are in place. The whining of a clerk discharged for indolence or incompetency, who, though he gained his place by the worst possible operation of the spoils system, suddenly discovers that he is entitled to protection under the sanction of civil-service reform, represents an idea no less absurd than the clamor of the applicant who claims the vacant position as his compensation for the most questionable party work.

The civil-service law does not prevent the discharge of the indolent or incompetent clerk, but it does prevent supplying his place with the unfit party worker. Thus in both these phases is seen benefit to the public service. And the people who desire good government having secured this statute will not relinquish its benefits without protest. Nor are they unmindful of the fact that its full advantages can only be gained through the complete good faith of those having its execution in charge. And this they will insist upon.

I recommend that the salaries of the Civil Service Commissioners be increased to a sum more nearly commensurate to their important duties.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, too, is credited with having recently said that "the most vital issue in American politics is reform in the civil service," which includes within its provisions those appointments in the civil service contemplated in the report concerning which we are now deliberating.

The Democratic party is in favor of civil-service reform. All honest American citizens, I doubt not, are in favor of it, but that doctrine commits no one to the present law or the bad practices under it.

Notwithstanding the abuse of the statute which existed at the time of the passage of this civil-service law there was incorporated in that law this provision (subdivision second and third of subsection second of section second of the civil-service act):

Second. That all the officers, places, and employments so arranged or to be arranged in classes shall be filled by selections according to grade from among those graded highest as the results of such competitive examinations.

Third. Appointments to the public service aforesaid in the Departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this clause of the civil-service act prohibits forever the correction of inequalities with reference to appointments which existed at the time of its passage. If it had undertaken to be a just law, to provide for representation for all the country alike, to treat every section fairly and equally in the distribution of the patronage, certainly there would have been incorporated in it a section providing for the correction of inequalities which existed at that time. But Mr. Eaton, who is credited with having drafted that civil-service law, was not very anxious to give the Southern or Western States an opportunity under the law to claim their rights in reference to the distribution of the patronage of the country, although the law as it then existed, and every principle of equity and justice, recognized their right to do so.

My observation has led me to the conclusion that we need not expect that a man who adapts himself to the ways of Washington society, and becomes initiated into the social circles of this city, as many members have unfortunately done, can bring himself up to such a point that he is willing to limit the appointments from the District of Columbia to the number to which the District is entitled under the law; besides you all know that more than half of the actual appointments from the District are charged to the States through fraud.

Mr. MILLARD. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask a question. Do I understand him to say that there is a discrimination in the enforcement of that law as against some of the States?

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, if the gentleman did not so understand me he has certainly misunderstood what I was saying.

Mr. MILLARD. Has the gentleman any particular State to which he refers in addition to the District of Columbia?

Mr. TAULBEE. The civil-service law provided that appointments made subsequent to its passage should be made upon the basis of population; but at the time of the passage of this act these appointments were not equally distributed; the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, and New York as well, had vastly more appointments than they were entitled to under the law.

Mr. MILLARD. Had more than their proportion at that time, you mean?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir; more than they were entitled to.

Mr. MILLARD. But under the present law. Do I understand the gentleman to claim that there is any favoritism shown?

Mr. TAULBEE. That is just what I am pointing out now. I say that prior to the passage of this law some States had an undue proportion of appointments, and that the same abuses are kept up under the present law.

Mr. KING. And the gentleman from Kentucky might add that the same is being done at the present time.

Mr. TAULBEE. I take this positition, that inasmuch as it will be conceded that at the time of the passage of the civil-service law there was an inequality in these appointments—the law itself providing that appointments made after its passage should be made upon the basis of population—that it has prohibited any possibility of correcting the inequality which existed at the time of its passage. I hope the gentleman now understands me.

Notwithstanding that provision of the law, according to the report of the Civil Service Commission we find that the District of Columbia, entitled to four appointments in each one thousand, has received twenty-three appointments, when according to the number appointed for the last year it would have been entitled to but two. This district then, entitled to two appointments, has received twenty-four under the operation of the civil-service law, following in the wake of the customs heretofore practiced and indulged in, when Kentucky, entitled to thirty-three in each one thousand, has only received seventeen in the last year. I submit to this House and to the country if that is fair; I submit to gentlemen upon this floor if that is good faith in executing the civil-service law? This job bears the ear-marks of Dorman B. Eaton. Besides, Mr. Speaker, by an examination of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, read from the Clerk's desk this morning, you will find that each and every one of these thirty-two substitutes, designated to fill places within the classified civil service, without examination, is made from the District of Columbia without one single exception.

Many other of the substitutes, who were dismissed for the purpose of "whitewashing" the Treasury and covering up the bad faith of the lieutenants of that Department in their execution of the civil-service law, were appointed from the District of Columbia. I propose, Mr. Speaker, for one, to enter my earnest protest against such bad faith, when this administration is committed to a faithful and honest execution of the civil-service law. I submit that it is not right or fair to adopt such a course in these appointments.

Having pointed out this glaring fault in the civil-service law, I must now, for the sake of economy of time, content myself with saying that one of its grossest defects is the exemption from competitive examination of the army of incompetent clerks appointed before its enactment and its failure to prescribe any moral qualifications. The only provision on this subject is that any one who has within a year preceeding his application been convicted of crime is ineligible to appointment. A murderer or thief may be appointed, provided his crime has not been proven and he convicted within a year.

Now, with reference to the resolution I introduced, and upon which the committee reported adversely, the substance of that was incorporated in the one read by the Clerk from the desk, and in response to which the Secretary of the Treasury gave us that answer. In that resolution this House decided that we were entitled to know by what authority of law these substitutes were appointed, in violation of what appears to us and must appear to every fair-minded man to be a plain provision of law.

Mr. MILLARD. May I ask the gentleman another question? I do not desire to interrupt him?

Mr. TAULBEE. Of course you do not.

Mr. MILLARD. But I would like to ask, if I understand the gentleman to claim that the present administration is not enforcing the civil-service law as required by the statute?

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, I hope the gentleman has been listening to what I said.

Mr. MILLARD. I have.

Mr. TAULBEE. And I hope the gentleman has not misunderstood me.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. It is utterly impossible to hear what gentlemen are saying.

Mr. MILLARD. I asked the gentleman from Kentucky if I understood him to say that the civil-service law is not enforced by the present administration in accordance with the terms of the statute.

Mr. TAULBEE. I will say, in response to the gentleman from New York, that I believe the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States are honestly trying to enforce it, but that the lieutenants under them—chiefs of bureaus—whose misconduct is flagrant and plain to the eyes of every man who knows anything about the Departments, have them so handicapped, misled, and imposed upon that it is absolutely impossible for them to give a faithful execution of the law. [Applause]. And I think, Mr. Speaker, that it illy becomes a man, whose party has had an opportunity for years to investigate these abuses, which I say have existed for twenty years in that Department, now when the Democrats take possession and Democratic representatives attempt to call attention to these abuses and so straighten up and bolster up these Departments as to command for them the full respect of the country, I say that no man identified with that party under whose administrations these abuses grew up can with good grace oppose this resolution or put in his oar in this matter.

Mr. CANNON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Why, always.

Mr. CANNON. Is there anything in the civil-service law that prevents the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States from removing the chief clerk, the appointment clerk, or every head of a bureau in that Department? Is there anything to prevent it?

Mr. TAULBEE. I will answer the gentleman that there is not; but that when the Democrats took possession of the executive branch of this Government the President announced his policy, and certainly the gentleman could not misunderstand him—that while the civil-service law should be carried out with reference to those appointments included within its specific provisions, its spirit should apply to all the offices of the country. The President may have differed and did differ with some of the most zealous advocates of Democracy on that point, yet it is his policy, and he has carried it out more fully than any of his Republican predecessors carried out its spirit with reference to changing the appointments under them when their predecessors belonged to the same political faith.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not think I have time to answer any more foolish questions [laughter]; but I believe I will allow the gentleman another question.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman states, if I understand him correctly, that he is satisfied the abuses about which he complains arise from the heads of bureaus. Now, if that be true, is his President incompetent or hypocritical in failing to remove those officers?

Mr. TAULBEE. Neither; but the President elected by the party to which I belong, has been occupied for the last two or three months in trying to hold the Senate in check to keep them from besmirching his character wrongfully because of the exercise of a discretion which the Constitution confers upon him. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLARD. Who is responsible for that?

Mr. TAULBEE. If the gentleman should insist that these abuses do not exist through the instrumentality of the chiefs of bureaus of these Departments, I will give him a specific case.

Mr. CANNON. I do not so insist. The gentleman makes these charges; I am neither affirming nor denying.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then what does your question lead to? To the consumption of time. Or are you catching at a straw?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has misunderstood me. He complains these abuses are committed by the heads of bureaus. I say that being true, if it is true, why does not his President remove them, and perform the duty which under his oath of office he owes to the country?

Mr. TAULBEE. In good faith, and in all earnestness, if the gentleman desires to be understood as being in earnest——

Mr. CANNON. I am in earnest.

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, you stand isolated from your party, for the Republican party has raised the hue and cry, and the controversy between the President and the Senate is based on the claim of the Republican party that he has indiscriminately removed men from office.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman will be allowed.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand the controversy the gentleman refers to, it was a controversy between the Senate and the President as to whether the President should profess to do one thing to please his Mugwump admirers and then turn around and do another thing secretly, in the teeth of his profession, to try to please gentlemen like my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. TAULBEE. Are you in good health? [Laughter.] I certainly think there must be something the matter with the gentleman. I thought he arose to answer a question.

Mr. CANNON. Possibly. I will let the House and the country determine whether the gentleman from Kentucky is sick or myself.

Mr. TAULBEE. I am willing. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope I will be permitted to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not subject to interruption except by his own consent.

Mr. TAULBEE. I was, when these interruptions began, undertaking to say that the objections to which I had alluded would illustrate the many features in the civil-service law which I consider highly objectionable. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that inasmuch as we have that law on the statute-book and are committed to its faithful execution, it is right and proper that this House should call the attention of the heads of these Departments to any abuse known to exist; and if they indulge, wink at, or tolerate these abuses, we have a right as representatives of the people to know by what authority it is done.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to be understood as making an assault upon the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury, because I know that they have enough to contend with in their controversy with the Senate. But I say that these abuses ought to be corrected. I do not propose to shut my eyes to the violation of law for the purpose of being considered an advocate of any particular policy or doctrine. My country and my honor stand above my party, and the Democratic party, with its doctrines and platforms and practices, stands far above the Republican party in my estimation.

But, Mr. Speaker, I say if my party does wrong, or if abuses grow up under a Democratic administration, when I have the right and the power I will call attention to it, will insist upon their correction, and will use such means as the law affords to bring about fair play in the appointments to positions in the Departments. I know that many Democrats are dissatisfied with the tardiness with which the Republicans are turned out of office, and it is unfortunate for my district especially. When the Democratic administration came into power there were only three Democrats from that district in the public service. One of them, with a record far better than Republicans in the same bureau, with longer experience in the service and better qualifications, has, under a Democratic administration, through the instrumentality of a Republican chief, been denied promotion, and his inferiors in point of length of service and proficiency in the office, as shown by the record, have been promoted over him. Another one has been dismissed.

I do not blame Democrats for complaining. I feel like complaining myself when these same men who were sent out at the last Congressional election with the campaign funds from the Departments to try to bring about my defeat and the defeat of other Democrats on this floor, now wink and jeer and sneer at Democratic members of Congress when they talk about asking for positions for Democrats, and go on drawing their enormous salaries from the Treasury and quietly saving up their earnings and their "percentages" for the approaching campaign. I say I feel like complaining, and I do not blame the Democrats for complaining. I say this state of things is evidence of bad faith upon the part of those men who are in authority under a Democratic administration. I propose to take the high ground that when the Democrats are intrusted with the administration of the executive branch of this Government, they are entitled to the public patronage. If there is anything that I admire in the Republican party it is the tenacity with which they hang together, the certainty with which they provide for men of their own party, and the promptness with which they turn out Democrats when they have a chance. [Laughter.] I believe that is the only good trait of character they have, but I am frank to accord them that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this resolution asks the Secretary of the Treasury to inform this House if there is any law by which these substitutes in the Department are appointed. The same question was asked in the former resolution, but the acting Secretary of the Treasury, in the absence of Secretary Manning, satisfied himself with answering a part of the resolution, saying that these abuses did exist, but forgot to answer why. This resolution proposes to call on the Secretary of the Treasury for the authority by which these abuses exist. If any gentleman on this floor is willing to cover this matter up, is willing to say that this House has no use for the information, or that the country is not entitled to call for it, then I ask him to vote with the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. I do not wish to reflect upon that committee, and I will not do so if I know myself, but I wish right here to express the hope, and the belief as well, that the adverse report on this resolution was not in any way influenced by the little unpleasant tournament of words between myself and the gentleman of that committee a few days ago.

I say that I will not attribute any motive of that kind to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service; but in view of that fact I wish further to say that an adverse report on this resolution was not at all unexpected by me.

Let us examine this report. The committee tell us that they are willing to accept the statement of the Secretary to the effect that these appointees are sick. Granting that this most wonderfully credulous committee is right in its opinion on that point, I still claim that the Secretary's report discloses an abuse. Some of these appointees have been off of duty since May, 1885. During this time the Government has accepted the services of the substitutes and has paid them therefor a price sufficient to satisfy the substitutes; for instance, Joseph M. Rickey receives $1,000 for his services.

Now, if he had been legally appointed that would look like square business; but will some one of the committee tell me by what authority the Secretary of the Treasury pays to Zabina Ellis the sum of $800 per annum? Whose money is it, and by what authority is it paid out? This resolution calls for that information. If the committee justify this transaction on the ground of sickness, I denounce the whole transaction as a fraud. All Christian people and philanthropists delight to sing of the virtues of benevolence and charity, but when any one posing before the country as a model of charity puts his hand into the Treasury of the people and takes therefrom the alms which he distributes the mantle of his hypocrisy becomes transparent as ether, and his ludicrous deformities are read of all men when the truth is known.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that our present civil-service law is modeled after the civil-service law of Great Britain, and the theory of life tenure in office which it attempts to put into effect is obnoxious and contrary to every principle of our democratic form of government. The beauty of our form of government is that all men stand equal before the law, and a man's promotion in both official and social position depends on his worth and merit, and not on the circumstance surrounding his birth. When these privileges are destroyed and class distinctions established either by law or custon violence is done to our free institutions, and a deadly blow is dealt to one of the pillars of strength on which rests the superstructure of our Republic.

This law attempts to create a class distinction and fasten on us a system of life tenure of office. This system of substitution, which in a certain sense has the sanction of that committee from which of all others the country has greater right to expect diligence in measures of reform, goes even further in that direction than the law; it ingrafts into our American system, the English idea of hereditary privileges. The report of the Secretary indicates, and the facts as I know them to exist present a state of case like this: Parents enjoy the public offices until they are too old to preform the duties and functions thereof, and they then turn them over to their children under the guise of substitutes until they are either educated in their duties until they can acquire them in their own right on the score of proficiency or until their recognition in the position is of such long standing that the memory of man runneth not thereon and they are recognized in their own right, or as has been the case in the Treasury during the last year and the years preceding appointments of special favorites are made outright to positions within the classified civil service without regard to any examination under civil service law.

I am not surprised to see gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber interpose their objection to this investigation. These principals are their party friends, but I do feel a surprise at any gentleman on this side of the House who from any consideration should oppose the resolution even though a correction of this abuse should result in dropping a substitute in whom they feel an interest, however great.

This system of abuses of public power and trust is only one of the many obnoxious practices now being carried on in the public service, handed down to the Democratic party as skeletons of fraud and theft by the Republican party, and which shall in due time receive their share of attention unless this House closes its eyes to these glaring outrages and refuses to be informed in relation thereto, in which event I must content myself with calling the attention of your constituents to the facts and have you go on record in relation thereto and then leave to you the task of explaining to them the reason for your action.

I now send to the Clerk's desk to be printed with my remarks an extract from the report of the Civil Service Commission, and submit the whole matter to this House and the country:

TABLE No. 5.—APPORTIONMENT.

(1) The civil-service act requires an apportionment of appointments to the Departments at Washington (which shall be made after its passage), to be made on the basis of population in the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, respectively.

(3) The third column of figures shows the precise percentage of these 559 appointments which each State and Territory was entitled to receive up to the date last named. The differences in the last two columns therefore show the variation from an exact apportionment.

The excess of appointments from the District of Columbia, Virginia, and Maryland was unavoidable in the early stages of the work of the commission, and arose mainly from the difficulty of providing persons having the technical knowledge needed in places for which special examinations are held. The commission has provided for examinations intended to prevent this excess in the future.

(4) The whole number of appointments apportioned prior to January 16, 1886, was in fact 716, but the commission has had no control over the apportionment of 157 of them, which were to the Pension Office. The apportionment of these 157 places was made under special rules Nos. 1 and 4. The apportionment of the 68 appointments, made by the appointing power during the year ending January 16, 1886, appears in Table No. 6.

Mr. FINDLAY rose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to know if it is proper for the Republicans to withdraw while this little family affair is being discussed on the other side of the House? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] is recognized.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that so far as I am concerned the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] can be excused.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I shall spare the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] any infliction so far as any discussion of family affairs by me is concerned, and shall confine what I have to say to what I consider to be the matter before the House. That is the report made by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], from the further consideration of which the committee asks to be discharged.

The acting Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Fairchild, under date of April 5, 1886, in response to a resolution addressed to him by this House covering the ground of the inquiry made by the gentleman from Kentucky, has made a report. In that report it is stated that while there are in the employ of the Treasury Department certain persons acting as substitutes in place of absent principals, yet those substitutes in every case, as I read the report, are there under a temporary appointment, drawing not a salary from the United States, but drawing a portion of the salary from the principal himself. They are in the shoes of the principal simply because the principal is not able to perform the duties of his place; in other words, the principal is sick.

Now although the inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury covered, it is due to frankness to state, a larger ground than is responded to in the communication which he has sent to this House, yet we are perforce, in the absence of any motive to question his good faith, compelled to take his report as covering the whole subject-matter. Now what does he say?

In reply thereto I would say that when employés of this Department are obliged to be absent on account of sickness, it has been customary to allow substitutes to act in their places if additional clerical force is required during their absence for the proper transaction of public business.

I understand this communication to mean that wherever and whenever a principal has been permitted to leave his station and a substitute has been suffered to take his place, it has been on account of sickness; and so the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service say in their report that, finding no good reason to question the good faith of the Secretary in making this report, and accepting that reason—namely, sickness—as a valid one for the substitution, they ask to be discharged from any further consideration of the matter. Further than that they do not go.

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask my friend a question.

Mr. FINDLAY. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. I understand the gentleman to say that the practice is to allow any employé of the Department when sick to furnish his own substitute.

Mr. FINDLAY. No, sir; nor does the acting Secretary say so. The acting Secretary is speaking in reference to a list of persons whose names are furnished here in obedience to the call contained in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky—the names of principals and substitutes, with their post-offices. I understand that the statement is confined to this matter and embraces no other. In other words, there was a specific inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury and answered by the acting Secretary, whether there were or were not such and such persons who were called principals whose places were filled by substitutes, and in answer to that he says specifically, "Yes, there are such and such persons, and here are their names; here are the salaries which one class receives and the compensation which the other receives."

Mr. OATES. The point on which I desired information was whether the head of the Department or any other officer of the Department selected the substitute, or whether the sick employé furnished his own substitute.

Mr. FINDLAY. On the contrary, the Secretary of the Treasury says that the substitutes are designated by the head of the Department:

The designation of such substitutes is made by the direction of this Department, and the substitutes so designated are compensated out of the regular salaries of the persons whom they represent. They perform such duties as may be required of them from time to time in the bureau or division to which they are attached.

Mr. OATES. Another question. Is it a regulation of the Department that the substitute shall not receive the whole pay, but only a part of it, when he is rendering the service?

Mr. FINDLAY. The report made by the acting Secretary of the Treasury, so far as I have looked into it, does not cover that point. It simply gives the salary which is allowed the principal and then the compensation allowed the substitute, thus showing the difference between the salary in the one case and the compensation in the other. If my friend from Alabama will look at page 3196 of the RECORD he will find a list of these names, from which he will get the information he desires. I will give him a single instance. I take the first name on the list.

Name of substitute.	Home post-office.	Date of designation.	Compensation of substitute.	Salary of regular employé.	Name of regular employé.	Home post-office.	Date of appointment.
Allen, Mrs. H. E	District of Columbia	Mar. 22, 1886	$840 00	$1,000 00	Renfro, George W	Kentucky	Sept. 29, 1863

In that case the substitute gets all the salary except $160.

Mr. MCADOO. What becomes of the balance?

Mr. FINDLAY. The balance goes to the principal.

Mr. ROGERS. If I may be permitted, I would like to inquire, in the first place, who arranges the matter of salary between the substitute and the principal?

Mr. FINDLAY. I suppose very likely the substitute and the principal make the arrangement, with the approval, of course, of the head of the Department.

Mr. ROGERS. I am asking for the fact, not a supposition. I want to know whether that is in proof or not.

Mr. FINDLAY. The gentleman is asking as to a question of fact to which I can not respond because it is not embraced in the report, and I have no information on the subject.

Mr. ROGERS. Another point. I would like to know how long this relation between the principal and the substitute is allowed to subsist?

Mr. FINDLAY. I am not running the Department.

Mr. ROGERS. I am aware of that, of course; but my question is, how long is this relation allowed to subsist between the principal and the substitute with the consent of the Department?

Mr. TAULBEE rose.

Mr. FINDLAY. I do not know whether my brother TAULBEE is going to answer that question or I am.

Mr. ROGERS. I would rather have you answer it.

Mr. HEWITT. I would like to ask the page upon which I can find that record.

Mr. FINDLAY. Permit me to answer the gentleman from Arkansas, and then I will answer the gentleman from New York as far as I can.

I say upon the face of this report, made by the acting Secretary of the Treasury, nothing appears to show how long the substitute is permitted to act in place of the principal, whether it is for a definite or an indefinite period, so far as the report is concerned, but the acting Secretary of the Treasury does say this substitution is by reason of sickness, and as sickness itself is of a definite or indefinite kind—can not be measured; you do not know whether it will last for a week or a month; some cases may last for six months, and even longer—I take it the substitution in place of the principal would last just as long as the sickness lasted.

Mr. ROGERS. Having obtained that much, and as it is all I can get on that point, I wish to put this further question to the gentleman from Maryland. Is it the present proposition to report a resolution back to the House, the purport and effect of which is to indorse and recognize the principle, namely, that with the permission of the Secretary of the Treasury, a regular appointee in the Government service shall have the right to appoint a substitute who shall remain for an indefinite period, covering a decade if necessary, to draw only a portion of the salary attached to the position, while the principal shall receive the difference between what is paid to the substitute and the salary attached to the position which is affected by this arrangement?

Mr. FINDLAY. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Arkansas has not fairly stated the question or the answer which I gave to it.

Mr. COX. Permit me to make a statement.

Mr. FINDLAY. Certainly; although in the multiplicity of these questions I am compelled to yield to one before I have answered the other.

Mr. COX. The bill now before the House, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, proposes to remove that very thing.

Mr. FINDLAY. That is not the question; that does not answer the question.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me answer just as it is. That bill is not in this resolution, and has no reference to the question as to how I am going to vote on this resolution.

Mr. FINDLAY. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. COX] has reported a resolution from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service which will answer the question as to the appointment of substitutes.

Mr. ROGERS. If it becomes a law.

Mr. FINDLAY. Sufficient unto the day is the blessing thereof.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FINDLAY. One question at a time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understood the gentleman to have answered the question put to him, but I do not wish to interrupt him without his consent.

Mr. FINDLAY. You break me all up by asking one question before I have answered another.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I beg pardon. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman without his consent.

Mr. FINDLAY. You have done it, and now I will answer your question.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What I want to ask the gentleman from Maryland is this: Whether any new law is necessary to correct this abuse?

Mr. ROGERS. Not at all.

Mr. MCMILLIN. So I understand that this has been a practice, one of the serious abuses which have gone on for years in the Departments of this Government, that it is not any new thing in this administration, that it is an inheritance from another party, and that no new law is necessary for its correction. What is necessary, however, is that the law shall be rigidly enforced, that the provision requiring the allowance of only a certain number of days for sick-leave shall be strictly executed and the practice which is now complained of shall be as far as possible broken up and eradicated.

Mr. FINDLAY. I will not go into the question of inheritance and patrimony from previous administrations. I was forcibly reminded of the foolishness of that sort of discussion by something that transpired in the Committee on Banking and Currency the other day, where a gentleman, protesting he was not a crank, when one of the committee suggested to him a question in regard to the truth of a matter, said he did not come there to discuss any side issues [laughter]; that he would not discuss the question of truth. Nor do I mean to discuss the question of inheritance or patrimony. I was bred a lawyer, and I hope I know enough of my profession to stick to the issue. The question I understood the gentleman from Arkansas to ask was whether or not the committee which made this report were willing to allow substitutes to be indefinitely employed in place of principals in the Departments, and whether they were willing to come into the House and give that measure their sanction.

Well, speaking for myself, not for the committee for I have no authority to speak for the committee, although I think I might do so possibly in this case, knowing as I do the sentiment of the committee, but speaking for myself simply, I reply to him no, unquestionably no. But at the same time I wish to say that there are exceptional cases continually arising, cases of peculiar hardship, cases that will not bear the closest scrutiny and investigation, cases that from the very force and stress of circumstances must be put up with and must be considered independently, each upon its own merits, which cases if they came before me and I was at the head of the Treasury Department I am afraid I would do precisely as has been done already by every Secretary of the Treasury who has been there heretofore, because I believe they know and feel as I would feel under like circumstances.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me ask the gentleman another question. If the gentleman from Maryland answers my first question as I understand him to answer it—in the negative—then why may we not have from the Secretary of the Treasury his authority for doing that which the Committee on the Civil Service say is done, but which they do not indorse?

Mr. FINDLAY. The Secretary of the Treasury gives us as his authority for this practice, as shown in his report, that it has been customary heretofore to do it.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I know of no custom that will authorize any officer of this Government to violate the law. The trouble in this country to-day is a want of reverence for the law; and if this principle may be recognized by the head of one of these Departments, I know of no reason why it may not be extended to every office under his control; and thus the Government Departments are run by substitutes and not by the principals, and by custom instead of law.

Mr. FINDLAY. There are two thousand one hundred and forty employés in the Treasury Department, I think. There are just thirty-two substitutes employed in the places of absent principals, absent on account of sickness, as reported by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ROGERS. Will not my friend from Maryland then answer whether or not in that event there are not just thirty-two violations of the law?

Mr. FINDLAY. No, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. Then if he says no, the Secretary of the Treasury ought, or the gentleman himself ought, to be able to give the law upon which his answer is based.

Mr. FINDLAY. I know of no positive law upon the statute-books which is violated by these appointments. If the gentleman from Arkansas asks me whether or not there is a positive law upon the statute-books authorizing this to be done, I answer him no, for I know of no such law; but as far as the existence of a positive law which prohibits that being done is concerned, I would like the gentleman from Arkansas to point me to such law.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, in the Federal Government the identical principle that my friend from Maryland suggests is so perverted as to be made the vice and evil of our times. Instead of looking to the Constitution for authority to do a thing, we examine the Constitution to see whether it prohibits it or not. It is no part of my business to tell the gentleman whether there is a law prohibiting a thing or not, but it is the duty of the head of any Executive Department, or of any other officer of the Government when he is called upon to give his authority for doing a thing, to point to the law under which he acts. Without such authority the power does not exist.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me to answer the question of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. FINDLAY. If the gentleman from Arkansas has not already sufficiently answered his own question, of course "the gentleman from Maryland" submits to the gentleman from Kentucky to answer it, so far as he is concerned.

Mr. TAULBEE. The answer to the gentleman from Arkansas is that it is now within the power of the Civil-Service Commissioners to put a stop to the abuse. The law provides that no appointments of these substitutes shall be had except on certifications by the United States Civil-Service Commission. That would answer the gentleman's objection if it was carried out in good faith.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. FINDLAY. Yes. There I think my brother TAULBEE fell into a serious error, a much more dangerous one indeed than the gentleman from Arkansas, whose responsibility he was taking upon his shoulders. The civil-service law to which the gentleman refers, and I think I have got him there, makes no such provision.

Mr. FARQUHAR. None whatever.

Mr. FINDLAY. On the contrary, the Civil Service Commission can only certify up for the purpose of filling vacancies.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is it precisely.

Mr. FINDLAY. There are no vacancies created when this principle of substitution is involved, for the substitute simply receives the pay and performs the work while the principal actually remains in office. The office is not vacant; the substitute is not appointed to fill the principal's place which has been rendered vacant, but he is simply doing the work of the principal for the time being, and the principal himself compensates the substitute. It is not the United States compensating him; it is the principal who is paying the substitute out of his salary.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. FINDLAY. Now, I did not think the Constitution of the United States was to be dragged into this question, and that the question of strict limitation of Federal authority was also to be dragged into the discussion.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. FINDLAY. What is your question?

Mr. TAULBEE. I simply wish to make a statement.

Mr. FINDLAY. Very well.

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman from Maryland has taken issue with my statement which I gave in answer to his question. If I understood his question it was whether or not there was any law that prohibited these practices.

Mr. FINDLAY. That is correct.

Mr. TAULBEE. My statement was that I read the law from the report of the Civil Service Commission as incorporated in the civil-service act, providing that no appointment to these positions could be had except on examination by the Civil Service Commission. The gentleman in response to that takes the position that these persons are not appointed, but that they are designated; that they are not paid by the Government, but by the principal appointees, if I understood him correctly. Now, if he proposes to draw the distinction between appointment to position and designation to the position, then I confess myself unable to answer his question.

Mr. FINDLAY. It is not a mere question of words. It is not a question in which the mere anceps syallabarum delights. It is not a question of verbiage; but it is a question of a principle of law involved in the case. And the proposition of law is this: that the office is held by the principal, and as long as the principal holds the office the substitute can in no sense be said to be the office-holder. Now the office-holder is certified up by the Civil Service Commission to fill a vacancy. There is no vacancy here by reason of the fact that the principal holds the office. Therefore there is no occasion for the certification by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FINDLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether it is true, as has been reported and as circulated through the country, that there are persons holding appointments in the Treasury Department who attend to other business in the city, and who send substitutes and draw the principal part of the pay?

Mr. FINDLAY. I have no information as to that, and am not aware that that is the fact. The committee has no information on that subject. I certainly have none myself. And I wish to say right here that I do not wish to be understood as justifying, and do not mean to be dragged by any process into a justification of, the general system of substitution in the place of the principal holding the office. Nobody shall put me in that position, for it is a false one; and the system is in violation not so much of the letter of the civil-service law, as it is in violation of the spirit of civil-service reform, which stands higher than the law. It is the letter of the law which killeth; it is the spirit which maketh alive. I do not care so much for the letter of the law; I want to see the spirit of the law observed.

I would like to see the administration of this great Government through all its offices put upon the highest possible plane. I would like to see every rogue scourged out of its high places, whoever he may be. I would like to see the administration to-day put its strong feet upon the necks of such men, instead of elevating some of them to high places.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this discussion has already taken a very wide range. I do not see what particular good is to be accomplished by it. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] is quite right in what he says about the Constitution and about the limited powers of the Congress of the United States under the Constitution. He is quite right when he says that the executive power particularly ought to be governed by such limitations. I am not here to dispute that; but I do undertake to say that if that small list of exceptions were scrutinized carefully it would be found there were cases of peculiar hardship that could not be exactly justified by a strict adherence to the letter of the law—I can not say the letter of the law, because there is no law on the subject; there is no positive enactment on the subject—but might not be strictly justified on the ground on which he has put it, that there must be some law in order to justify it. I say if that list were closely scrutinized there might be found many cases of peculiar hardship. And when the acting Secretary of the Treasury finds that has been a custom recognized by all his predecessors; that he has been simply following in the line of those who have gone before him for the purpose of relieving some case of destitution and distress, some father, for instance, who is sick and whose son may take his place; some sister, who may be sick and whose brother may take her place; where the United States is not subjected to one cent of extra expense, the salary remaining the same as fixed by law, the work being done by the substitute just as well as it is done by the principal, and the principal paying the substitute for the work—I say it can not be defended on strict principles and I am not here so to defend it, nor do the committee so intend in their report; but limiting the case strictly to the case of sickness, accepting the report of the acting Secretary of the Treasury as true that these cases of substitution have been caused by sickness of the principals, upon that ground, and that ground alone, we simply say we will investigate the matter no further and ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FINDLAY. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman if there has been any opinion from the Attorney-General to the effect that the employés are entitled to their salaries during their sickness?

Mr. FINDLAY. I have heard that there was such an opinion. I have not examined it, but I should certainly think it was good law.

Mr. BLOUNT. If that were true, then the employment of substitutes would appear to be rather a matter of economy to the Government?

Mr. FINDLAY. I should say that that would be good law. The employé is in the place; until he is turned out he remains there, and as long as he remains in the office he is entitled to all the emoluments connected with it.

I move to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] on the table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is reported back by the committee.

Mr. TAULBEE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. FINDLAY. Oh, I think this discussion has gone far enough. I will not withdraw the motion. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. TAULBEE. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his motion. I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to gratify my friend from Kentucky under other circumstances, but I think enough time has been consumed in this discussion.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish simply to say this: the gentleman has the power; I question his right.

Mr. FINDLAY. I shall insist upon my motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] moves to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the question again stated definitely.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is a resolution of inquiry introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] and addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury. It was referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service; it is now reported back adversely, and the motion of the gentleman from Maryland is to lay it on the table.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be again read.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the original resolution and the report of the committee both will be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has directed the resolution to be read.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask that the report be read also.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. Both the resolution and the report have been read to the House. Is there objection to the reading of the resolution at this time?

Mr. SPRINGER. No.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Is that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE]?

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and reported back to the House adversely by that committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. And the proposition now is to lay it on the table?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] now moves to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 73.

Mr. TAULBEE. No quorum has voted. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection to the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and there were—yeas 114, nays 113, not voting 96; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further reports the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio to call up the special order.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to ask what is the regular order to-day?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Territories. The order of the House sets apart this day, after the morning hour, for the consideration of such bills now on the Calendar as may be called up by the Committee on the Territories, not to interfere, however, with general appropriation or revenue bills. The morning hour is, under the rule, the hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BEACH. Does that order exclude the second morning hour?

The SPEAKER. There is but one morning hour.

Clause 3 of Rule XXIV provides:

On all days other than Monday as soon as the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of, and on all Mondays (except the first and third in each month) after the call of States and Territories, there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed, and a copy thereof mailed by the Public Printer to each Member and Delegate; and the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in regular order and then upon the select committees; and if the whole of the hour is not consumed by this call, then it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of other business, as hereinafter provided; but if he shall not complete the call within the hour he shall resume it in the succeeding morning hour where he left off.

Section 5 of the same rule provides:

After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed) the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee on being named shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day on either the House or Union Calendar.

Thus preserving throughout the rule the distinction between the hour for the consideration of bills and the morning hour for the call of committees. The order of the House sets apart this day, after the morning hour, for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. HATCH. I only raised that question for the purpose of obtaining a ruling of the Chair and a construction of this rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the meaning, in fact the very language of the rule itself.

Mr. HATCH. I would inquire, Mr. Speaker, if the reports of the standing committees have been completed?

The SPEAKER. The call of committees has been completed.

INSURANCE LAWS IN DAKOTA.

Mr. HILL. In pursuance of the order I call up a bill in charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE], the bill (H. R. 5888) to legalize and validate the general laws of the Territory of Dakota for the incorporation of insurance companies and to authorize and empower the Legislative Assembly of said Territory to pass such general laws.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all general laws heretofore enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota providing for the incorporation of insurance companies are hereby legalized and made valid, and are declared to have the same force and effect as if the said Legislative Assembly had had full power and authority to enact the same; and all insurance companies incorporated under said laws and in accordance therewith are hereby declared to have been legally incorporated.

SEC. 2. That the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota shall have power to provide by general laws for the incorporation of companies for insuring against loss by fire, lightning, hail, and tornadoes, and also of life-insurance companies.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give validity to certain acts passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, providing for the incorporation of insurance companies. The laws which the bill is intended to legalize and validate are laws general in their character. The bill as introduced provides for the legalizing of all insurance companies in the Territory, whether incorporated under general or under special laws. But the committee reported a substitute for that bill, and in this substitute only general laws are legalized. The Territorial Legislature of Dakota very shortly after the organization of the Territory, assuming that it had the power to pass laws generally providing for the incorporation of companies, passed a general insurance law, and at different times since it has passed supplements or amendments to this insurance law.

Under the original act a number of insurance companies were incorporated in the Territory. Doubts have arisen whether the Territorial Legislature had this power, and it is in order to remove these doubts and to give unquestionable legal existence to these companies and to protect the rights of the companies themselves, and the rights of those who have dealt with them, that the passage of this act is asked for. Under the act organizing the Territory it is provided that—

The legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act.

Assuming that the Territorial government had general powers not inconsistent with the Constitution and the laws of Congress, it undertook to pass these general incorporation laws. But in the act of 1867, section 1889 of the Revised Statutes, specific powers are given to the Territorial Legislature relating to the creation of corporations. This section is as follows:

The Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories may, * * * by general incorporation acts, permit persons to associate themselves together as bodies corporate for mining, manufacturing, and other industrial pursuits, or the construction or operation of railroads, wagon-roads, irrigating ditches, and the colonization and improvement of lands in connection therewith, or for colleges, seminaries, churches, libraries, or any benevolent, charitable, or scientific association.

It will be observed that the right to incorporate insurance companies is omitted, and this is what raised the doubt as to the existence of that right in the Territory of Dakota. The committee found that the general laws which it is proposed to validate seemed to be well and carefully drawn and calculated to protect the interest of insurers as well as of insured; and failing to find any good reason why the Territorial Legislature should not have the power to establish insurance companies, the committee has recommended the passage of this bill. For myself I see no reason why that power should not exist in a Territory as well as in a State. In Territories insurance companies are as much needed and there is as much reason for there existence there as in the States. And it is better a Territorial government should have the right to create, regulate, and control the companies within the Territory than that only foreign companies should exist. Therefore I know of no reason why this bill should not become a law.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. As I listened to the reading of the bill it seemed to give validity to certain acts heretofore passed. Does it also enlarge the powers of the Legislature so that acts creating corporations there hereafter shall have validity?

Mr. BOYLE. I can answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois best by reading the second section of the bill. It provides—

That the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota shall have power to provide by general laws for the incorporation of companies for insuring against loss by fire, lightning, hail, and tornadoes, and also of life-insurance companies.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it would not have been well to have extended that provision to the Territories in general. It is manifest the act of 1867 was too restricted if it was intended as a restriction, but I think it was not. The action of that law was, in fact, to ratify legislation which had occurred. It seems to me, however, that there is no reason to doubt the existence of these powers in a Territorial government were it not for the inference drawn from the act of 1867. But inasmuch as the act of 1867 does raise some doubt, why not extend the provision to the Territories in general, for this is a power which certainly could be very safely exercised? We should not multiply our laws unnecessarily.

Mr. BOYLE. For myself I see no reason why the power should not be given to other Territories as well as Dakota. But when it comes to legalizing what has been done in Territories it might be very unwise to legalize the acts of certain Legislatures and altogether wise to legalize the acts of others. We find on examination the laws passed in Dakota have been carefully and well drawn. That may not be the fact as to laws passed by other Territorial Legislatures, and it might be very unsafe to legalize laws generally upon this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not proposing that we legalize anything which has been done, but simply that we confer on all the Territories the same powers which this bill proposes to confer upon the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. BOYLE. I see no objection to that; the second section might be amended in that way, if it is the wish of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not amend it by striking out in the second section the words "Assembly of the Territory of Dakota" and insert "Assemblies of the several Territories;" so as to read: "That the Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories shall have power," &c.?

Mr. BOYLE. If the gentleman offers that amendment I have no objection to it personally. I do not know what may be the views of the committee.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I consider the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] a very legitimate extension of the scope of the bill, but I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether it has not occurred to him that there might be a still further extension by allowing the Territorial Legislatures to incorporate, as do the States, organizations for all purposes of pecuniary profit, excepting such as we may choose to except. These Territorial Legislatures now have power to charter corporations for certain specific purposes; and we propose by this bill to add another specific purpose—insuranee. Why not allow all branches of business to come in under a general law?

Mr. HILL. There are a thousand reasons why that should not be done, as the gentleman would readily recognize if he were conversant with the state of affairs in some of the Territories.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Well, it may be there are reasons applicable to the Territories which would not apply to a State.

Mr. GIFFORD. We do not ask such an extension of the law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 1 and 2 of section 2 strike out "Assembly of the Territory of Dakota" and insert "Assemblies of the several Territories."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the title of the bill by striking out all after the words "insurance companies" and inserting "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOYLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. HILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 6966) to change the time of the meeting of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the first Monday in January, 1887, be, and the same is hereby, fixed as the time for the commencement of the next biennial session of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory; and that the biennial session of the Legislative Assembly be held every two years thereafter.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the passage of this bill is asked for by a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, as well as by the Territorial officers and the Delegate from that Territory. An act of Congress is required to legalize the day for the meeting of the Legislative Assembly; and the day named in the bill is acceptable to the officers and people of the Territory. I do not deem it necessary to make any further statement. I hope the bill will be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories to pass such general laws as may be necessary for the government of their respective Territories, not inconsistent with acts of Congress or the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts hereafter passed by any Territorial Legislature in conflict with the provisions of this act shall be null and void.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Territories was read, as follows:

In line 4 of section 2 insert, after the word "Territories," the words "on the subjects above mentioned."

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill are copied verbatim from the constitution of the State of Illinois, and similar provisions will be found in the constitutions of most of the States of the Union. The bill simply prohibits the passage, in the cases enumerated, of local or special laws in the Territories. I think one of the greatest abuses in the Territories has been the passage of laws of this character. This bill, if passed, will require general laws on these subjects instead of special ones. The subject has been discussed in most of our States in the formation of our State constitutions, and wherever provisions of this kind have been adopted the most salutary results have followed. I think the same benefits should be extended to the Territories. If no gentleman desires to speak on the subject, I ask for a vote.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF MUNICIPAL BONDS, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. HILL. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6965) to authorize Columbia County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the construction of a court-house.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MILLS). This bill is in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the House now proceed to consider it.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the county of Columbia, in Washington Territory, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to issue its bonds, payable in not less than five nor more than fifteen years, at 8 per cent. per annum, to the amount of $40,000, for the purpose of building a county court-house, in accordance with the vote of the people of said county at the general election held in November, 1884.

Mr. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, this is a local bill, proposing to authorize Columbia County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the building of a court-house. The necessity for the passage of the bill will appear, briefly stated, in a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

TERRITORY OF WASHINGTON, Office of the Secretary.

I, N. H. Owings, secretary of the Territory of Washington and custodian of the great seal, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of writing—house memorial No. 17, to authorize the county of Columbia, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the construction of a court-house—with the original, now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom, and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said Territory, at Olympia, this 11th day of February, 1886.

[SEAL.] N. H. OWINGS,
Secretary of the Territory.

Memorial to authorize the county of Columbia, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the construction of a court-house.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the people of the county of Columbia, by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington Territory, respectfully represent, that said county of Columbia was duly organized in the year 1875; that since the organization the authorities of said county have been paying rent for court-house and public offices in a sum equal to 8 per cent. per annum upon $10,000; that at the general election held in said county in the year 1884 a vote was taken upon the proposition to build a court-house at a cost not to exceed $40,000, and that said proposition was carried in the affirmative by a large majority; that, while the said county is clear of debt, it is not considered good policy to burden the people with an increased tax sufficient to raise the sum required. The assessed value of the property of the county for the year 1885 was as follows: Real estate, $1,514,900; personal property, $1,054,480; total, $2,569,380. That the said county is rapidly settling up with thrifty people, and we have reason to believe that the assessable value of the property therein will rapidly increase. In view of the foregoing facts your memorialists pray for authority to issue bonds, payable in not less than five nor more than fifteen years, at 8 per cent. per annum, to the amount of $40,000, for the purpose of building a county court-house, in accordance with the vote of the people of said county, as aforesaid. And your memorialists will ever pray.

Passed the house of representatives February 2, 1886.

R. O. DUNBAR,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the council February 3, 1886.

B. B. DAY,
President of the Council.

Approved February 4, 1886.

WATSON C. SQUIRE,
Governor.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROBATE COURTS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. HILL. I now call up the bill (H. R. 5496) to increase the jurisdiction of probate courts in Arizona and to repeal all acts of the Territorial Assembly creating county courts in said Territory, which is under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in addition to jurisdiction over all matter of probate, the probate courts in the different counties in the Territory of Arizona shall have appellate jurisdiction over all appeals from justices of the peace, the trial on appeal to be de novo, and also original jurisdiction in all causes in which the action if assumpsit would lie at common law, where the amount involved does not exceed $500.

SEC. 2. That appeals may be taken to the district court in all matters of probate, and in all other cases to the supreme court of the Territory, as is or may be prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts of the Legislative Assembly creating county courts in the different counties in the Territory of Arizona are hereby disapproved, and declared to be inoperative, null, and of no effect.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the report of the committee in this case will explain the provisions of the bill and the necessity for its passage more briefly than I could, and I therefore ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred House bill 5496, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The thirteenth Territorial Legislature of Arizona, which met in January, 1885, passed special acts creating county courts in several of the largest counties of the Territory, and prescribed the jurisdiction thereof. The jurisdiction conferred upon such county courts embraced all the matters now cognizable in the district courts of the Territory, except capital criminal cases. The effect was to establish a court of general common-law jurisdiction in such counties in addition to the district court of like jurisdiction, presided over by an associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory, appointed by the President. This imposed upon each county the double expense of grand and petit juries, and all other expense attending such courts. It has come to the knowledge of your committee that this additional expense is a very great burden upon the taxpayers of the Territory, and that no substantial benefits result, as the district court can easily perform all the duties required. The grand jury of Pima County, at the recent term of court in that county, unanimously reported to the court that the new county court was unnecessary, expensive, and oppressive upon the people, and recommended that that court be abolished.

The bill which your committee has reported increases the jurisdiction of the probate courts in the Territory, so as to confer authority to try de novo appeals from justices of the peace, and also original jurisdiction in all cases in which the action of assumpsit would lie at common law, where the amount does not exceed $500.

It is believed by your committee that this increased jurisdiction to county courts will furnish all the relief that is required for an efficient administration of justice in connection with the general common-law jurisdiction of the district courts held in each county of the Territory.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the third section of the bill should be amended, out of abundant caution, so as to provide "that nothing in this act shall invalidate any proceedings which shall have taken place in the legislation of the Territory in the county courts." I will propose that amendment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Can you abolish these courts, and if you can, why not abolish them? Is there not some inconsistency in saying they have no valid existence, and then saying their acts shall be valid?

Mr. SPRINGER. You do not say that.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. You say they shall be held and be of no effect.

Mr. SPRINGER. It says that all acts or parts of acts of the Legislative Assembly creating county courts in the different counties in the Territory of Arizona are hereby disapproved, and declared to be inoperative, null, and of no effect. They are repealed.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Are they repealed? I confess I am ignorant of Territorial organizations. Is it true that these courts had a legal existence?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is the opinion of most of the lawyers in the Territory those acts were invalid and contrary to the enabling act of the Territory. My amendment is "that nothing in this act shall be construed to affect any proceedings in these courts prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Has the gentleman made any provision for business now pending in these county courts which he proposes to abolish?

Mr. SPRINGER. That business would go to courts having jurisdiction; that is, district courts of the counties. Parties litigant would simply bring their suits in the other courts.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Would that be the effect without further legislation?

Mr. SPRINGER. This was prepared by distinguished lawyers in the Territory, and I presume they covered everything that is necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to invalidate any judgment of any court prior to the passage of this act: And provided further, The business pending in said courts shall be transferred to the district courts of such counties.

Mr. BOYLE. I desire to call the attention of my colleague upon the committee to one other matter in connection with this bill. It provides for giving the probate courts of the Territory common-law jurisdiction up to $500; and provides for an appeal from the justices of the peace to the probate court, and the trial of the appeals in that court. I assume that these appeals are to be tried there, as in other cases, by a jury, and so far as I know no provision is made for a jury trial in these probate courts. Of course I do not know what provision may have been made in the Territories in this regard; but I suggest to my colleague that it is possible to give to the probate courts jurisdiction, and the right to try appeals from the judgments of the justices, without having the proper machinery for such cases as will certainly require a jury.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is provided for under the local laws of the Territories as to the proceedings of the probate courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INSANE ASYLUM, ARIZONA.

Mr. HILL. I now call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 2812) to approve an act of the Thirteenth Legislative Assembly of Arizona entitled "An act to establish, maintain, and provide for the government of an insane asylum," approved March 9, 1885, in charge of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMAN], to whom I yield.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act to establish, maintain, and provide for the government of an insane asylum," passed by the Thirteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, and approved by the governor of said Territory of Arizona on the 9th day of March, A. D. 1885, is hereby approved.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. HERMAN. This is a provision of law to legalize an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, constructing or authorizing the construction of an insane asylum for that Territory. The asylum was built and is now in full operation and a number of inmates are cared for in it.

Subsequent to the enactment of the provision of law in question it was discovered that the Territorial Legislature had no authority to do what was done by them. Therefore at its last session the Legislature memorialized Congress to legalize, by this bill now pending, the proceedings of that Legislative Assembly authorizing the construction of this asylum. That is all there is of it; and the committee unanimously report in favor of authorizing what has been done, believing it to be a just and meritorious measure and this to be a deserving bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HERMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURTS, WYOMING.

Mr. HILL. I now call up for consideration House bill No. 3760 to enlarge the jurisdiction of the probate courts in Wyoming Territory, and yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], in whose charge the bill is.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the probate courts of the Territory of Wyoming, in their respective counties, in addition to their probate jurisdiction, be, and they are hereby, authorized to hear and determine all civil cases wherein the damage or debt claimed does not exceed the sum of $500, exclusive of interest, and such criminal cases arising under the laws of the Territory as do not require the intervention of a grand jury: Provided, That they shall not have jurisdiction in any matter in controversy when the title, boundary, or right to the peaceable possession of land may be in dispute, or in chancery or divorce cases: And provided further, That in all cases an appeal may be taken from any order, judgment, or decree of said probate courts to the district court.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed: Provided, That this act shall not affect any suit pending in the district courts of said Territory at the time of its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming, Mr. CAREY, who introduced this bill, for an explanation of it.

Mr. CAREY. This bill, Mr. Speaker, proposes to confer upon the probate courts of Wyoming Territory jurisdiction in civil cases where the amount involved does not exceed $500. Under the act organizing the Territory the judicial power is vested in a supreme court, a district court, a probate court, and justices of the peace. Under the construction placed upon the law, the probate court has now only jurisdiction of the class of cases that ordinarily arise in probate courts. Congress conferred similar jurisdiction to that proposed here upon the probate courts of Colorado to the extent of $2,000, and have since conferred the same upon the probate courts of Montana to the extent of $500. This bill now under consideration only permits in civil cases jurisdiction where the amount involved is not in excess of $500. It does not give the right to try chancery cases, and only the right in criminal cases which do not require the intervention of a grand jury.

I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question with reference to the jurisdiction of this Territorial court?

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 14, between the words "order" and "judgment," insert the word "or," and also in the same line, after the word "judgment," strike out the words "or decree;" so that it will read:

"And provided further, That in all cases an appeal may be taken from any order or judgment of said probate courts to the district court."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAREY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert:

"Provided further, That the forms and proceedings had before said probate courts shall be as may be provided by the laws of said Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORGANIZATION OF TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. HILL. I now call up the bill (H. R. 7217) to provide for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes. This bill has been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. We do not propose to ask a vote on it to-day, and may as well discuss it in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the proposition that the debate shall run in the House; but when the bill comes to be considered for amendment it ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HILL. We propose to do that next Saturday.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent to let it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole for to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. But subject to the point of order next Saturday.

Mr. HILL. Next Saturday I will move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. What reason is there for taking a different course to-day?

Mr. HILL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CRISP in the chair) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7217) to provide for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all that part of the United States included within the following limits, except such portions thereof as are hereinafter expressly exempted from the operations of this act, to wit: Bounded on the west by the State of Texas and the Territory of New Mexico; on the north by the State of Colorado and the State of Kansas; on the east by the State of Missouri and the State of Arkansas; and on the south by the State of Texas, comprising what is known as the Indian Territory and the public-land strip, is created into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Oklahoma: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property or to impair any patent to lands now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory under the laws and treaties of the United States, or to include any territory occupied by any Indian tribe to which title has been conveyed by patent from the United States, without the consent of said tribe, or any territory which by treaty or agreement with any Indian tribe is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries and constitute no part of the Territory of Oklahoma until said tribes shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included in the said Territory of Oklahoma, except for judicial purposes as provided herein, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulation or enact any law respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, which it would have been competent to make or enact if this act had never passed.

SEC. 2. That there shall be a governor, secretary, Legislative Assembly, supreme court, attorney, and marshal for said Territory, who shall be appointed and selected under the provisions of title 23, chapter 1, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the government of all the Territories. The provisions of said title shall have the same force and effect in the Territory of Oklahoma as in other Territories of the United States: Provided, That the Legislative Assembly and Delegate to the House of Representatives shall not be elected until the President shall order: Provided further, That no person shall be entitled to vote at the first election, or to be elected to any office, who has not been a bona fide resident of said Territory for sixty days previous to said election: And provided further, That the council in said Territory shall consist of thirteen members, and the house of representatives shall consist of twenty-six members, which may be increased to thirty-nine.

SEC. 3. That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect in said Territory of Oklahoma as elsewhere in the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the local governments of any of the Indian tribes which may now be provided for by the laws and treaties of the United States, or which may exist in conformity thereto: And provided further, That the supreme court of the Territory shall fix the times and places, within the limits of the area occupied by the five civilized tribes, at which courts shall be held; and the jurisdiction of the courts held therein shall embrace all causes of action, crimes, and offenses arising in the Indian Territory heretofore cognizable in the United States courts of the western district of Arkansas, in the district of Kansas, and the northern district of Texas; and all laws heretofore passed granting jurisdiction to said United States courts within the Indian Territory are hereby repealed; but cases now pending shall be prosecuted to their final disposition therein, the same as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 4. That the section of country lying between the States of Kansas, Colorado, and Texas, known as the public-land strip, is hereby declared to be a part of the public domain of the United States, and shall be opened to settlement under the operation of the homestead laws only: Provided, That the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of said lands shall be reserved for school purposes.

SEC. 5. That whenever the Creek and Seminole tribes of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section, in legal manner, to the commission provided for in this act, and the President has issued his proclamation fixing the time as provided herein, the unoccupied lands ceded to the United States by said tribes under the treaties of June 14, 1866, and March 21, 1866, shall be opened to settlement, except the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, which shall be reserved for school purposes, and shall be disposed of to actual settlers only, in quantities not to exceed 160 acres, in square form, to each settler, at the price of $1.25 per acre. All persons who are heads of families or over twenty-one years of age, and who are citizens of the United States, or who have declared their intentions to become such, shall be entitled to become actual settlers on such lands. An accurate account shall be kept by the Secretary of the Interior of the money received as proceeds of the sale of said lands. The commission hereinafter created by this act is hereby authorized to confer with the Creeks and Seminoles to determine whether said Indians are entitled to any further compensation for said unoccupied lands. If said commission shall agree that further compensation should be paid said Indians, they may fix the amount of such additional compensation, not to exceed the sum of $1.25 per acre, less the cost of sale and amounts heretofore paid said tribes in the purchase of said lands; and any additional sum agreed upon by said commission to be paid said tribes for said lands, as provided herein, shall be placed to the credit of such tribes on the books of the Treasury.

SEC. 6. That whenever the Cherokee tribe of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section, in legal manner, to the commission provided for in this act, and the President has issued his proclamation fixing the time as herein provided, the unoccupied portion of the lands west of 96° of longitude, agreed to be ceded to the United States by the said tribe of Indians by the treaty concluded July 19, 1866, shall be opened to settlement, excepting the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, which shall be reserved for school purposes, and shall be disposed of to actual settlers only, in quantities not to exceed 160 acres, in square form, to each settler, at the price of $1.25 per acre. All persons who are heads of families or over twenty-one years of age, and who are citizens of the United States, or who have declared their intention to become such, shall be entitled to become actual settlers on said lands. An accurate account shall be kept by the secretary of the Interior of the money received as proceeds of sale of said lands, and said money shall be placed to the credit of the Cherokee Indian tribe on the books of the Treasury, after deducting the cost of sale by the United States, and the amount heretofore appropriated and paid to the Cherokee tribe as part compensation for said unoccupied lands: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any person to enter upon or occupy any of the lands mentioned in this or the preceding section, for the purpose of settlement or otherwise, until after the Indian tribes mentioned and the commissioners herein authorized have concluded an agreement to that effect as provided herein, and laid the same before the President of the United States, who is thereupon authorized to issue his proclamation declaring such relinquished lands open to settlement, and fixing the time from and after which such lands may be taken. Any person who may enter upon any part of such lands contrary to the provisions of this act, and prior to the time fixed in the President's proclamation, shall not be permitted to make any entry upon such lands or lay any claim thereto; and satisfactory proof shall be required by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the effect that this provision has not been violated by the claimant to any of such lands. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall hereafter be ineligible to take any homestead or make any entry of lands in said Territory of Oklahoma.

SEC. 7. That the President may, at such times as he may deem it necessary, direct a land-office to be opened in the Territory of Oklahoma, and may nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint the usual officers to conduct the business of said land-office; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall, when directed by the President, cause the various portions of said lands to be properly surveyed and subdivided, where the same has not already been done. It is hereby made the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to carefully examine each claim taken under the provisions of this act before issuing a patent to the claimant; and if it shall appear that said claim was not taken in good faith, he shall refuse a patent, and declare all prior proceedings before had in such case to be null and void; and all persons settling on said lands under the provisions of this act shall be required to maintain a continuous personal residence of five years before obtaining title thereto, agreeably to the provisions of the homestead laws; but payments for said lands may be made in installments, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a commission to be composed of five persons, whose duty it shall be to enter into negotiations with the several Indian tribes within the limits of Oklahoma Territory, for the purpose of procuring the assignment of lands in severalty and the purchase by the United States of the relinquished and unoccupied lands. The powers and duties of said commission shall, under the direction of the President, extend to all matters relating to the settlement of the Indians on other lands or reservations than those now occupied by them, and to their education, civilization, and citizenship. The commission is authorized to enter into such agreements with the Indian tribes as it may deem necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, and to submit the same, through the President, for the action of Congress. The compensation of the members of said commission shall be at the rate of $3,000 per annum, and not more than three of whom shall be members of one political party. They shall also be allowed, in addition thereto, their actual necessary traveling expenses, stationery, and postage. They shall have power to appoint a secretary, who shall receive an annual compensation of $1,800, and such allowances for traveling expenses as he may actually incur.

SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, for himself or any company, association, or corporation, to directly or indirectly procure any persons to settle upon any lands opened to settlement by this act, with a view to their afterward acquiring title to said lands from said occupants; and the parties to such fraudulent settlement shall severally be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished, upon indictment, by imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, or by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 10. That all leases of lands belonging to the United States or held in common by any of the Indian tribes within the Territory of Oklahoma, as organized by this act, including the Cherokee strip west of the ninety-sixth degree of longitude, whether controlled by persons, corporations, or others, except such leases as are held for the purpose of cultivating the soil strictly for farming purposes, are hereby declared void and contrary to public policy; and it is hereby made the duty of the President, immediately after the passage of this act, to cause the lessees of said lands, or persons illegally occupying the same, to be removed from said lands.

SEC. 11. That the act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, which incorporated the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, and the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad and its extension to Red River, and an act of Congress granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Southern Branch of the Union Pacific Railway, and a telegraph, from Fort Riley, Kans., to Fort Smith, Ark., approved July 26, 1866, or any other acts of Congress so far as they relate to lands granted in said Indian Territory and the public land strip, except for the right of way and necessary stations, as now provided for by law, are hereby repealed; and any or all right to said lands is hereby forfeited to the United States; and no railroad company now organized, or hereafter to be organized, shall ever acquire any lands to aid in the construction of its road, or in consequence of any railroad already constructed, either from the United States, or from any Indian tribe, or from any Territorial government or State Legislature within the limits of said Indian Territory.

The following amendments were recommended by the committee:

In section 11, line 14, after the word "stations," insert "as far as said roads may now be completed."

At the end of the bill add the following amendment:

"SEC. 12. That neither the Legislative Assembly of said Territory nor any county, township, town, or city therein shall have power to create or contract any indebtedness for any work of public improvement, or in aid of any railroad constructed or to be constructed, nor to subscribe for or purchase any shares of stock in any railroad company or corporation."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the committee for a few minutes while I endeavor to explain the provisions of this bill. It provides for the organization of a new Territory of the United States to be called the Territory of Oklahoma. The districts of country embraced within its provisions comprise three separate and distinct tracts: The first is the Public Land strip, which was acquired from Texas in 1850, and contains 3,672,640 acres of land. Over this Public Land strip the Government of the United States has absolute control, and always has had, so that there can be no question whatever as to the power of Congress to open up this tract of country for settlement. Another section of country embraced within the provisions of the bill is the so-called Territory of Oklahoma, which was purchased by treaty from the Creeks and Seminoles in 1866 and which contains 1,880,500 acres.

There is also the Cherokee strip, which was also negotiated for by treaty, containing 6,022,855 acres—making in all nearly 12,000,000 acres of land, or a district of country as large as Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and Delaware combined. The bill does not propose, Mr. Chairman, to violate any treaty whatever with any tribe of Indians. By reference to the treaty of 1866 it will be seen that the Territory of Oklahoma and the Cherokee strip were acquired for a special purpose. That purpose was for the settlement of friendly Indians or freedmen in that Territory.

I have never held nor do I now hold that the Government of the United States has the right to open up that Indian country for settlement by white settlers without the consent of those Indians; that would in effect be a violation of the spirit of the treaty. But it is a notorious fact, Mr. Chairman, that the policy which the Government originally intended to inaugurate, which was to settle upon that country friendly Indians or freedmen, has long ago been abandoned, and that the Government has not now any intention whatever of making any attempt, so far as we can gather from proper authorities, to settle either freedmen or friendly Indians upon any part of this Territory which I have named.

The bill provides, as will be seen by the reading of it, for the appointment by the President of the United States of a commission of five persons to treat with these Indians with the view of securing a modification of these treaties to such an extent as to admit of white settlements in the Territory named in the bill and without which the bill, of course, and all its provisions would be of no force or effect, so far as it relates to that portion of the country once controlled by the Indian tribes.

It also provides for the appointment of a governor and secretary of the Territory, United States marshals, and a Territorial court and proper officers to put in motion the machinery of a Territorial government. In the event of successful negotiations with these Indian tribes, the bill provides further for selling the lands therein contained in tracts of 160 acres each and no more. To actual settlers patents to issue after five years' residence. And it provides further for the extreme punishment of any person or persons who undertake to invade the Territory or any part of it for illegal settlement until after the consent of the Indians has been obtained.

It is, in my judgment, an exceedingly well guarded and carefully drawn bill. If gentlemen of the committee will take the pains to read it they will see that no possible outrage can be committed or injury done to any persons whatever by its passage.

As to the fertility of the soil of that country there can be no question. All the information we have from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and from reports that have been made from time to time by special committees authorized by Congress, and from reports of the Secretary of the Interior and others, is that the country embraced within the provisions of the bill contains a fertile soil, blessed by as healthy a climate as any part of our public domain.

The treaties with these Indians I have already mentioned, and I will not take time to discuss the provisions of any of them. Suffice it to say that I concede to the minority of the committee to which I have the honor to be chairman that so far as that part of their report which construes the treaties is concerned I cordially agree with them. I would not ask for the violation of a single line or word or letter of any treaty with any Indian tribe; and I claim, Mr. Speaker, that not a single section can be found in the bill or a letter which violates a single letter of a treaty which is now in force between the United States Government and the Indian tribes in the Indian Territory.

This Territory is a part of the territory included in the Louisiana purchase, as members of the committee are well aware. Now, I desire to read some information which I have obtained from the report of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who was authorized by the last Congress to make a special examination of the condition of the tribes in that Territory, and to report the result to Congress. After setting forth the extent of the country, the report (page 40) says:

> The civilized nations—Cherokees, Chickasaws, Choctaws, Creeks, and Seminoles—and all of the other more advanced tribes are in the eastern part of the Territory. Here the principal progress in agriculture, as well as in general advancement, has been made, while an extended portion of the west is occupied by the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Wichitas, Kiowas, and Comanches, with a united population of 7,746, who have made comparatively little progress, with very unimportant improvements, and none of a permanent character.

The report goes on to say that—

> In the heart of this Territory is situated the tract of land containing 1,887,800.47 acres, known as "Oklahoma," being a part of the land purchased by the Government at 15 and 30 cents an acre, by treaties made in 1866 with the Creeks and Seminoles, a tract of land comparing well in fertility and streams of water with the southern portion of the State of Kansas. This Oklahoma tract is surrounded on every side by lands which the Government, by treaty or agreement, have ceded to Indian tribes. It is manifest that the Government can not consistently with its agreement with the Creeks, permit this tract of land to be occupied except by Indians.

The report further says that, so far as the other tribes are concerned, no progress has been made, that the Arapahoes and Cheyennes occupy a tract of country embracing nearly 5,000,000 acres of land, having been put there by departmental orders some years ago, and that they have cultivated only about 600 acres of it, never exceeding 1,000, and are lying around on the grass like a lot of dogs sleeping in the sun, being fed at the expense of the tax-paying people of this country.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman, in the last portion of his statement just made, was not quoting from the report. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. No; not from your report—your part of it, but I have simply told the truth, Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Indiana well knows. The minority report, prepared by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr CANNON], says:

> This reservation is west of and adjacent to Oklahoma. Its area is 4,297,771 acres. The Indians thereon number 3,600 men, women, and children. It would support, if perfectly developed, 300,000 people. Situate upon it is Fort Reno, the Darlington agency, and four boarding schools for Indian children, maintained by the Government, and, with all the aid given the Indians by the many employés of the Government, farmers and others, there was only 1,000 acres of land in cultivation in the aggregate last year.

This report further says:

> The failure to expel the few white men who are in possession of 7,000,000 acres of the Territory we submit affords just ground of complaint to the large number of our citizens who desire to occupy small tracts in Oklahoma for homes, and who have as much right, and far greater equity, to do so than have the few cattle-men to occupy much larger tracts for grazing, and that the obligation resting upon the Executive to remove such lessees and other unauthorized persons as trespassers upon land in the Indian Territory, and the propriety of such action, result from express treaty provisions and the action of the Executive in removing trespassers, cattle-men, from the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservations and settlers from the Oklahoma section.

The committee also say that—

> The proper policy to pursue, not only in the Indian Territory but generally—especially in the large reservations in Dakota and Montana, where the lands are agricultural—is to cut up the reservation system at the roots; abolish the tribal relations; allot to each Indian adult a tract of land in severalty; let it be his, and let it descend to his children; compel him to settle upon it; make it inalienable for a generation, or longer if necessary; sell the the remainder of the lands in the different reservations to actual settlers in not exceeding 160-acre tracts; let the proceeds of such sales constitute a trust fund for the Indians, &c.

Mr. Chairman, my attention was directed the other day to some remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] while discussing the river and harbor bill, in which he said that the professions which had been made by the Democratic party during the late campaign had proved to be false, and he quoted from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] to show that that gentleman had been mistaken. I want to say to those gentlemen that they are both mistaken. The President's order and proclamation never applied to any part of the Indian Territory whatever, except the Arapaho and Cheyenne reservations, and from that country the cattle-men were expelled.

As to the Cherokee strip and the Oklahoma strip which had been leased to a syndicate by the Cherokee Indians—without authority and in violation of law, as I claim, no order from the Executive ever issued asking that these men be expelled. The question was twice referred to the Attorney-General of the United States. The first Attorney-General who gave an opinion upon the subject was Mr. Devens, who, in an elaborate opinion, which will be found at page 1470 of the sixteenth volume of the Reports of the Attorney-Generals, held that—

> The Cherokee Nation itself could not settle one of its tribes upon this strip; and if such tribe could not settle one of its citizens thereon, it follows that it could not authorize the settlement thereon of white persons, or lease the same to any person, which includes the right of occupancy.

This very question, involving the validity of these cattle leases, was referred last year to the Department of Justice for the opinion of the Attorney-General, and on the 21st of July Attorney-General Garland, in response to an inquiry by the Secretary of the Interior, gave an elaborate opinion, in which he quoted the statutes in that case made and provided, and held that every one of these leases to these cattle syndicates by these Indian tribes was in violation of law—was null and void, of no force and effect.

Having come to that part of the bill, I desire to state that the information of the committee derived from the report of the Secretary and other documents is that this vast country, containing nearly 8,000,000 acres of land, and also another portion of the Indian reservation containing nearly 4,000,000 acres more, have been leased from time to time in violation of the laws of the United States, without the shadow of any authority whatever, to vast cattle syndicates both in England and this country, at a rate of perhaps 1 cent or a little more an acre; and these syndicates have sublet the land to smaller syndicates for a sum five times as large as the amount which they pay; in other words, they pay $100,000 a year for the Cherokee strip and are receiving $500,000 a year from syndicates that have subleased it from them. For every dollar they have paid out to these ignorant Indians they get $5 in return; and by reference to the report of my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] it will be seen that it is the opinion out there that some of these leases were obtained by the grossest kind of fraud and corruption.

I will take the liberty of incorporating in my remarks the opinion of Attorney-General Garland on this subject, in which, as I have stated, he decided these leases to be absolutely without authority—null and void:

> DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
> Washington, July 21, 1885.
> SIR: By your letter of the 8th instant, inclosing a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the 7th, the following questions are, at his suggestion, submitted to me with request for an opinion thereon:
> "Whether there is any law empowering the Interior Department to authorize Indians to enter into contract with any parties for the lease of Indian lands for grazing purposes; and also whether the President or the Interior Department has any authority to make a lease for grazing purposes of any part of any Indian reservation, or whether the approval by the President or the Secretary of the Interior would render any such lease made by Indians with other parties lawful and valid."
> These questions are propounded with reference to certain Indian reservations, namely:
> 1. The Cherokee lands in the Indian Territory west of ninety-sixth degree of longitude, except such parts thereof as have heretofore been appropriated for and conveyed to friendly tribes of Indians.
> 2. The Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation in the Indian Territory.
> 3. The Kiowa and Comanche reservation in the Indian Territory.
> Our Government has ever claimed the right, and from a very early period its settled policy has been, to regulate and control the alienation or other disposition by Indians, and especially by Indian nations or tribes, of their lands. This policy was originally adopted in view of their peculiar character and habits, which rendered them incapable of sustaining any other relation with the whites than that of dependence and pupilage. There was no other way of dealing with them than that of keeping them separate, subordinate, and dependent, with a guardian care thrown around them for their protection. (3 Kent Com., 381; Beecher vs. Wetherby, 95 U. S., 517, where most of the cases on this subject are cited and discussed.)
> Thus in 1783 the Congress of the Confederation, by a proclamation, prohibited "all persons from making settlements on lands inhabited or claimed by Indians without the limits or jurisdiction of any particular State, and from purchasing or receiving any gift or cession of such lands or claims, without the express authority and directions of the United States in Congress assembled," and declared "that every such purchase or settlement, gift or cession, not having the authority aforesaid, is null and void, and that no right or title will accrue in consequence of any such purchase, gift, cession, or settlement." By section 4 of the act of July 22, 1790, chapter 33, the Congress of the United States enacted "that no sale of lands made by any Indians, or any nation or tribe of Indians within the United States, shall be valid to any person or persons, or to any State, whether having the right of pre-emption to such lands or not, unless the same shall be made and duly executed at some public treaty, held under the authority of the United States." A similar provision was again enacted in section 8 of the act of March 1, 1793, chapter 19, which by its terms included any "purchase or grant of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indians or nation or tribe of Indians, within the bounds of the United States." The provision was further extended by section 12 of the act of May 19, 1796, chapter 30, so as to embrace any "purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim thereto." As thus extended it was re-enacted by the act of March 3, 1799, chapter 46, section 12, and also by the act of March 30, 1802, chapter 30, section 12.

In the above legislation the provision in terms applied to purchases, grants, leases, &c., from individual Indians as well as from Indian tribes or nations; but by the twelfth section of the act of June 30, 1834, chapter 161, it was limited to such as emanate "from any Indian nation or tribe of Indians." And the provision of the act of 1834, just referred to, has been reproduced in section 2116, Revised Statutes, which is now in force.

The last-named section declares: "No purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indian nation or tribe of Indians, shall be of any validity in law or equity, unless the same be made by treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the Constitution."

This statutory provision is very general and comprehensive. Its operation does not depend upon the nature or extent of the title to the land which the tribe or nation may hold. Whether such title be a fee-simple, or a right of occupancy merely, is not material; in either case the statute applies. It is not, therefore, deemed necessary or important, in connection with the subject under consideration, to inquire into the particular right or title to the above-mentioned reservations held by the Indian tribes or nations respectively which claim them. Whatever the right or title may be, each of these tribes or nations is precluded, by the force and effect of the statute, from either alienating or leasing any part of its reservation, or imparting any interest or claim in and to the same, without the consent of the Government of the United States. A lease of the land for grazing purposes is as clearly within the statute as a lease for any other or for general purposes, and the duration of the term is immaterial. One who enters with cattle or other live-stock upon an Indian reservation under a lease of that description, made in violation of the statute, is an intruder, and may be removed therefrom as such, notwithstanding his entry is with consent of the tribe. Such consent may exempt him from the penalty imposed by section 2117, Revised Statutes, for taking his stock there, but it can not validate the lease, or confer upon him any legal right whatsoever to remain upon the land; and to this extent and no further was the decision of Judge Brewer in United States vs. Hunter, 21 Fed. Rep., 615.

But the present inquiry in substance is (1) whether the Department of the Interior can authorize these Indians to make leases of their lands for grazing purposes, or whether the approval of such leases by the President or the Secretary of the Interior would make them lawful and valid; (2) whether the President or the Department of the Interior has authority to lease for such purposes any part of an Indian reservation.

I submit that the power of the Department to authorize such leases to be made, or that of the President or the Secretary to approve or to make the same, if it exists at all, must rest upon some law, and therefore be derived from either a treaty or statutory provision. I am not aware of any treaty provision, applicable to the particular reservations in question, that confers such powers. The Revised Statutes contain provisions regulating contracts or agreements with Indians, and prescribing how they shall be executed and approved (see section 2103); but those provisions do not include contracts of the character described in section 2116, hereinbefore mentioned. No general power appears to be conferred by statute upon either the President or Secretary, or any other officer of the Government to make, authorize, or approve leases of lands held by Indian tribes; and the absence of such power was doubtless one of the main considerations which led to the adoption of the act of February 19, 1875, chapter 90, "to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases." The act just cited is, moreover, significant as showing that, in the view of Congress, Indian tribes can not lease their reservations without the authority of some law of the United States.

In my opinion, therefore, each of the questions proposed in your letter should be answered in the negative, and I so answer them.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

A. H. GARLAND, Attorney-General.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The Secretary of the Interior, on page 32 of the report, says:

By the third article of the treaty of August 11, 1866, it is stipulated that in compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon, the Seminoles cede to the United States their entire domain, consisting of 2,169,080 acres, at the rate of 15 cents an acre. By the third article of the treaty of August 11, 1866, the Creeks, for the same purpose, ceded to the United States the west half of their entire domain, which cession passed 3,400,000 acres at the rate of 30 cents per acre, the two cessions combined aggregating 5,571,000 acres. In pursuance of the purpose for which these lands were ceded to the United States, portions on the east and the west thereof have been from time to time set apart for and assigned to certain tribes and bands of friendly Indians for their use and occupancy. That portion of land remaining unappropriated to the trust provided for in the treaties lies very nearly to the center of the Indian Territory. It is this unappropriated tract that is commonly called Oklahoma. No agent of the Government resides upon that land; and it is not occupied in any way by any person or persons for any purpose under any authority of this Department.

That is the statement of Secretary Lamar so far as regards the Territory of Oklahoma.

Commissioner Price shows that the entire purchase-money of the Oklahoma tract was paid; that out of the amount agreed to be paid to the Cherokees for their tract they received some $347,000, demanded more, but it has not been paid. It is also shown by Mr. Price's report that nearly 8,000,000 acres of land belonging to other reservations in the Indian Territory are inhabited by less than 7,000 people, being about 1,200 acres to each man, woman, and child in the entire Territory.

The bill provides for the removal, if consent can be had, of the Arapahoes and Cheyennes from the reservation which they now hold and upon which they were placed by a departmental order, to the eastern part of the Territory. In the event this is done, all the Indians in the Indian Territory will be put together in the eastern part of the Territory; and they will then have on the west, as they now have on the north, the east, and the south, civilized communities of people.

I call attention to the remarkable fact that the only portion of all these Indians in that country or in the United States which have made any progress whatever in civilization is that portion of the Indians which lie immediately next to the State of Arkansas and north of the State of Texas and south of the State of Kansas. And wherever they have been thus brought into direct contact with the civilizing influence of the white man, and with the modes of transacting business of the whites, with their schools, their churches, they have made more progress. And this is the only place where they have made any progress at all.

If this bill should become a law the western portion of this entire Territory will be opened up to settlement, and, in my judgment, in a few years it will be as densely populated as is the prosperous State of Kansas at this time.

This table, which I took from the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I desire to incorporate in my remarks right here at this point.

Table showing the land owned by the following tribes in the Indian Territory.

Now, sir, the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs says that they have a feudal system in the Indian Territory which is equal in barbarism to that which prevailed in the Middle Ages. They have vast tracts there under the hands of chiefs, who lord it over the others, who have vast incomes and control the others, who while they live in a sort of princely way, as it were, the poor serfs who work for them and perform labor in the culture of corn and raising of cattle do not know at night where they will get a meal the next day.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to land monopolies in this country. I am opposed to baronial estates in the Indian Territory or in any other part of the American domain. And, sir, there is only one way to get rid of it, and that is for Congress to enact some law or to give the country some legislation to strengthen the hands of the President of the United States in dealing with lawless invaders of that Indian Territory.

I have said all I desired to say pretty much on this subject. I have stated the objects and provisions of the bill, what is the amount of land included in it and what it is.

Mr. LANHAM. In that connection will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. In defining the boundaries of the proposed territory did the committee take into consideration the fact there is a controversary between the State of Texas and the United States in reference to the title of that section of country lying east of the one hundredth meridian, between the north and south forks of the Red River?

Mr. HILL. Yes, and that country which is called Grier County is not included within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LANHAM. The bill provides that this territory shall be bounded on the west by the State of Texas and the Territory of New Mexico; on the north by the State of Colorado and the State of Kansas; on the east by the State of Missouri and the State of Arkansas; and on the south by the State of Texas, comprising what is known as the Indian Territory and the public-land strip.

The land in dispute between the State of Texas and the United States is known, perhaps, on the maps of the United States as a part of the Indian Territory, but in Texas it is known as Grier County.

Mr. SPRINGER. This bill intends to leave that county or that disputed territory just where it now is, to be determined by whatever may be the decision of the arbitration now going on between the United States and Texas. If it shall result in favor of the United States, then it will be included within this Territory, and not otherwise.

Mr. LANHAM. Inasmuch as there is such a commission to ascertain the real boundary between the State of Texas and the United States, would the gentleman in charge of the bill object to an amendment to the effect that this shall not prejudice the claim of the State of Texas as to the title to that territory?

Mr. HILL. I do not object to such an amendment; but I do not think any amendment is necessary. If it should be found that that country belongs to Texas and not to the United States, then this bill would not apply to it all.

Mr. LANHAM. There is no disposition then to interfere with the action of that commission?

Mr. HILL. No, sir; none whatever. It is only to include that part over which the United States has undisputed control.

Mr. LANHAM. I thought it proper to make the inquiry so that there could be no mistake on this point; especially in view of the fact that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] is the only member of the Committee on Territories now who was with me on that committee in the last Congress and was familiar with the facts of the case in relation to the passage of the bill providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate this question of disputed boundary. That bill was reported from the committee and passed the House.

Mr. NEECE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. I understand him to say that this Oklahoma strip was not legally occupied by any person at this time. I wish to ask if, as a matter of fact, it is not occupied by these syndicates of cattle-men?

Mr. HILL. I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; it never has been to any extent.

Mr. STRUBLE. I beg to say there is difference of opinion upon that point, and I shall attempt to show that it is so occupied.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know how it may be now; but in last November it was not occupied by anybody except a small portion of the men under Couch who were settled upon the Northern Fork of the Canadian River and were removed the next day by military force.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana that there is no legal occupancy, but there are cattle there.

Mr. NEECE. But as to the matter of actual occupancy, I wish to inquire if there are not cattle syndicates now there?

Mr. HOLMAN. The military authorities were actively engaged in preventing any occupancy of that strip when I was there.

Mr. HILL. There have been time after time attempts to acquire unlawful occupancy of the Territory. During the administration of Mr. Arthur raids were made by persons seeking settlement, and the President issued a proclamation and had these persons removed by force. The same has been done since and threatened to be done again since the present administration came into power. There has been a repeated effort on the part of the people of Kansas, Missouri, and other Western States to lodge settlements in this fertile part of the country.

I intended to state when interrupted that petitions have been presented through this House from nearly every labor organization of the whole country, from farmers, grangers, from lodges, from posts of the Grand Army of the Republic—soldiers—asking that legislation looking to the settlement of this Oklahoma and Indian Territory shall be enacted.

If these lands can be obtained by the modification of these treaties and opened to white settlement there will then be left lands enough in the Indian Territory to give every Indian, little and big, young and old, nearly a thousand acres of land apiece.

It will only result in the removal of about twenty-six or twenty-seven hundred Indians from the Arapaho and Cheyenne reservations to the western border of the eastern part of the Indian Territory, and have them all there in a compact form.

Now, while this bill does not propose to interfere at all with the tribal relations of any of these Indians, I believe the time will soon come, and ought to come, when these tribal relations are to be broken up, and when the lands of all this country should be allotted in severalty and occupied in severalty by families of Indians; for in no other way, in my judgment, can the humanizing and civilizing influences of an enlightened race be brought to bear upon that class of people.

Mr. KING. What is the area of this proposed Territory?

Mr. HILL. It embraces about 12,000,000 acres, with a view of taking in 4,000,000 acres more in future.

Mr. KING. That makes sixteen millions in all?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It proposes to take in eight millions more.

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; eight millions more, making twenty millions in all.

Mr. KING. How many Indians are there to-day?

Mr. HILL. About thirty-six hundred.

Mr. Chairman, ever since 1873 there has been a great depression in all our manufacturing and labor districts in the United States. It culminated in 1877 in the most extensive and disastrous labor strikes ever witnessed in this country. Millions of property were destroyed by violence in some of our large cities, and many other millions by the shrinkage of values. These strikes have been repeated more or less every year since, and they are being repeated now. I am not aware that the condition of the laborer or his employer has been benefited by them. Both have suffered. The prices of all manufactured articles, without any change in tariff laws, has become lower and lower, and the wages of labor have become lower and lower. No remedy has been applied or proposed. This bill proposes a remedy in part when it proposes to provide good homes for a hundred thousand idle men.

Mr. Jefferson, nearly a hundred years ago, with that sagacity with which he was pre-eminently endowed, foresaw these troubles and suggested the same remedy which we hope to afford in the passage of this bill. In his Notes on Virginia he said:

> The political economists of Europe have established it as a principle that every state shall endeavor to manufacture for itself; and this principle, like many others, we transfer to America, without calculating the difference of circumstances, which should often produce a different result. In Europe the lands are either cultivated, or locked up against the cultivator. Manufactures must, therefore, be resorted to of necessity, not of choice, to support the surplus of their people. But we have an immensity of land courting the industry of the husbandman. Is it best, then, that all our citizens should be employed in its improvement, or that one-half should be called off from that to exercise manufactures and handicraft for others? Those who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God, if ever He had a chosen people, whose breasts He has made His peculiar deposit for substantial and genuine virtue. It is the focus in which He keeps alive that sacred fire, which otherwise might escape from the face of the earth. Corruption of morals in the mass of cultivators is a phenomenon of which no age or nation has furnished an example. It is the mark set on those who, not looking up to Heaven, to their own soil and industry, as does the husbandman, for their subsistence, depend for it on casualties and caprice of customers. Dependence begets subservience and venality, suffocates the germ of virtue, and prepares fit tools for the designs of ambition. This, the natural progress and consequence of arts, has sometimes perhaps been retarded by accidental circumstances; but, generally speaking, the proportion which the aggregate of the other classes of citizens bear in any State to that of its husbandmen is the proportion of its unsound to its healthy parts, and is a good enough barometer whereby to measure its degree of corruption. While we have land to labor, then let us never wish to see our citizens occupied at a work-bench or twirling a distaff.

It may be said here that this territory is not fit for cultivation, only for grazing purposes. The same was said of the entire Louisiana purchase, of which this forms a small part. When Mr. Jefferson was about to negotiate for it and after it had been purchased he was denounced for it throughout the country. It was called the land of frogs and alligators, and it was openly asserted that a crow could not fly across it without taking his dinner along. Now that territory has been carved into ten States and nine Territories, containing a population of 10,000,000 of intelligent, thrifty people. Kansas was formerly denominated an arid, sandy desert. To cross it on the way to California in 1848 and 1849 in search for gold was to cross the desert; but time has demonstrated that the masses who stopped in Kansas found more gold in the soil than the masses who went to California found in the mountains.

The growth of Kansas is without a parallel in American history. She has half a dozen Representatives on this floor to-day, and more than a million of population, while every county in the State is dotted over with churches, and schools, and colleges, and the whole State has become a network of railroads, and telegraphs, and telephones, showing they have all the comforts of civilization which the progress of the age affords.

Mr. PETERS. We can go you one better. Kansas has one more than half a dozen Representatives on the floor; she has seven.

Mr. HILL. That is a lucky number, which I hope you will keep till you change your politics. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the condition of things in the Indian Territory as shown by the reports of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs presents a deplorable picture. They show that we have a feudal system there equal in its barbarism to that of the Middle Ages. If the Democratic party have any mission at all in this country it is to legislate for the interest of the masses of the people against the few. If there is class legislation on the statute-books it ought to be repealed. If there are monopolies they ought to be abolished. This bill forfeits a railroad land grant, and it required class legislation to create the grant. It seeks to abolish cattle monopolies and cattle syndicates, whether they be of foreign or native origin. It abolishes a system of land monopoly which has in every age and every clime proved the unrelenting foe to civil and religious liberty. Where the few own the land and the many do not, you have oligarchy and despotism; where the many own it and the few do not, you have republican government.

It seeks to abolish a system of baronial estates which destroyed Irish liberty and Irish independence and cursed and crushed that patriotic people for six centuries. For hundreds of years that people have appealed to the justice of mankind for aid and sympathy. Thank Heaven, they are now getting both at home as well as from America. By their determined efforts, undying patriotism, and thirst for freedom, the Irish people have nerved the arm and fired the brain of the mighty Gladstone to that great plane of statesmanship which enabled his eloquence and the justice of his cause to thrill the world. Let not the example of England and Ireland be imitated or tolerated in America. Class legislation has already donated a vast empire five times as large as Ohio to corporations. In violation of law, right in the heart of the Mississippi Valley, we find another empire consecrated by permission to cattle barons and monopolists at a rental of a little over a cent an acre, where a full-grown ox is raised for market at a cost of 25 cents while it costs $25 in Ohio and Illinois and Missouri.

Let us wage eternal war on all these monopolies in every shape. The settlement and occupancy of these lands can not long be delayed. It requires the vigilance and physical force of the Army to prevent it now. Even that can not long prevent it. The resistless energy and enterprise of the American people have spanned all the great mountains and united the Atlantic with the Pacific by bands of iron and steel. The same energy and enterprise will not forever permit this vast area of fertile country to be turned over to monopolists and worthless savages. If this bill passes a few short years will witness there what we now see in Kansas, free homes and well-cultivated farms, towns, cities, churches, schools, colleges, and a net-work of railroads, telegraphs, and telephones, with all the comforts of civilization. Whether it passes or not, the agitation has begun.

The people will get the facts, and the dark shadow which now hovers over this garden of the great valley will be dispelled by the industry of thousands of happy farmers, and another bright star added to our glorious constellation in the Federal galaxy. Even now I think I can behold the dim but visible star of Oklahoma. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. The rest of my time, if I have any, I have agreed to give to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining. Does the Chair understand him to yield that time to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HILL. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will take only five minutes.

Mr. HILL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, as he can not be here next Saturday, and the remaining ten minutes of my time I reserve for myself.

Mr. TOWNSHEND addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I think unanimous consent had better be given generally for gentlemen to extend their remarks upon this bill in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. BLAND. What provision is made for disposing of these lands.

Mr. HILL. The bill provides for the sale of these lands at $1.25 an acre, and it also provides that the proceeds of the sale shall be given to the Indians.

Mr. BLAND. Will not that give an opportunity for these syndicates to buy up the whole territory.

Mr. HILL. No, sir. If the gentlemen will read the bill he will see that each person can get only 160 acres, and that it must be for actual settlement.

Mr. WEAVER. Personal settlement.

Mr. HILL. Personal settlement; and the bill further requires five years' residence and cultivation of the land before a patent can be obtained.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] desired to proceed with some remarks this evening, but it is quite late, and I suggest, if it will suit him as well, that the committee had better rise.

Mr. BAKER. I think I must proceed now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman desires to proceed, of course I have no objection. We wish to have a vote on the bill on Saturday next, and the number of gentlemen desiring to speak makes it perhaps necessary for some to speak to-day.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, the importance of this question, in my judgment, is such that I desire to urge upon the members of the committee that they shall take the trouble to read carefully the bill now under consideration and the reports both of the majority and the minority of the Committee on Territories. This subject has received a large portion of the attention of the committee during several months past, and it is one which I think deserves the careful consideration of ever member of the House. Intelligent action upon it demands that it shall receive such attention and consideration, and I desire to submit at this time a few observations which may commend themselves to gentlemen on this floor and to those not present who may take the trouble to read them in the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, in all dealings with and treatment of the American Indians, especially during the past half century, it has been the settled policy of our Government to preserve the autonomy of the several tribes in their governmental affairs, and to encourage them in building and maintaining for themselves a better social and domestic existence. To that end millions of dollars have been voted, numerous treaties concluded, and no end of legislation enacted.

Prominent among Congressional enactments stands the act of May 28, 1830, found at page 411, volume 4, Statutes at Large. Under it the United States proceeded to extinguish the Indian occupancy title to all the lands now embraced in and known as the Indian Territory. To pay therefor that bill appropriated $500,000. Having thus acquired the Indian title, thereby perfecting the title previously acquired by purchase from France, and consequently vesting in the United States the full and absolute ownership, the Government proceeded, pursuant to said act, and in accordance with existing treaty, to, and did by, patent dated December 31, 1838, convey it all to the Cherokee Indian Nation in fee-simple.

The treaty referred to is that of 1828, by which the United States had agreed to convey a large portion, extending from the west line of Arkansas to the western frontier. That treaty was, by a new compact made in 1833, reaffirmed, by which the United States covenanted and agreed to "possess the Cherokees and guarantee them forever" these lands so conveyed. This title in the Cherokee Nation was commented upon by the United States court in a decision made at the May term, 1879, United States vs. Reese, by which the learned court held that under the treaty of 1833 the title of the United States passed to the Cherokee Nation absolutely. In delivering the opinion of the court Mr. Justice Parker said:

> There is no limitation on the title conveyed by the United States to the Cherokees by the treaty of 1833, and if said treaty was inconsistent with the act of 1830, it repealed so much of it as was inconsistent; that the language of the second article of the treaty of 1835 was a recognition of the cession of these lands, and if they had already been ceded to the Cherokees by the treaty of 1833, the agreement by the United States by the article of the treaty of 1835 to give them a patent for these lands, according to the act of Congress of May 28, 1830, was a mere nudum pactum. It was an attempt to place a restriction on a title that had already passed. * * * This Indian title being a base, qualified, or determinable fee, with only the possibility of reversion, and not the right of reversion in the United States, all the estate is in the Cherokee Nation of Indians.

In speaking of the patent for these lands to that nation, Attorney-General Devens said (16 Opinions, page 430):

> The effect of the conveyance by the United States to the Cherokee Nation of this tract of land [he is referring to the 800,000-acre tract, but it will be borne in mind, it is included in the same patent with the other tracts] upon the purchase made by them under the treaty of 1835 was to vest in the tribe a fee-simple title to said tract. This tribe did not hold this tract of land by the ordinary Indian title, which is one of occupancy only, which may be continued indefinitely. In such case the fee simple to the land is in the United States. The effect of this sale was to separate distinctly the tract from the public lands of the United States and vest it in private ownership.

The Cherokee title was also passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Holden vs. Joy, decided at the December term, 1871. (17 Wallace, page 211.) In its opinion the court says:

> Evidently, therefore, the Cherokees were competent to make the sale to the United States, and to purchase the lands agreed to be conveyed to them by the second article of the treaty. Both parties concede that the title of the United States to the tract known as the Cherokee neutral lands was perfect and complete, and that the tract includes the land in controversy.
> Title to that tract was acquired by the United States as a part of the Louisiana purchase from the French Republic. By the treaty between the United States and the French Republic of April 30, 1803, the chief executive officer of that republic ceded the said territory to the United States, with all its rights and appurtenances, forever. (8 Stat. at Large, 200.)
> When the President took possession of the territory the absolute fee-simple title and right of sovereignty and jurisdiction became vested in the United States as the successor of the original discoverer, subject only to the Indian title and right of occupancy as universally acknowledged by all the departments of our Government throughout our history. All agree that this land then, and for many years thereafter, was occupied by the Osage Indians. On the 2d of June, 1825, the Osage tribes, by the treaty of that date, ceded to the United States all their right, title, interest, and claims to the lands lying * * * west of the State of Missouri, with such reservations and for such considerations as are therein specified, which, it is conceded, extinguished forever the title of the Osage Indians to the neutral lands. (7 Stat. at Large, 240.)

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not true that the case to which he refers involved only the title to part of the 800,000 acres of land lying in the State of Kansas, to which there had been a subsequent treaty between the Cherokee Nation and the United States which authorized this sale out of which the controversy arose?

Mr. BAKER. Very true; but it also involved the question of the title of the Cherokees to Oklahoma, or the lands now possessed by them in the Indian Territory.

Mr. STRUBLE. Not by direct issue in the suit.

Mr. BAKER. No; but the court goes on to say:

> Possessed as the United States were of the fee-simple title to the neutral lands, discharged of the right of occupancy by the Osage Indians, it was clearly competent for the proper authorities of the United States to convey the same to the Cherokee Nation. Subsequent acts of the United States show that the stipulations, covenants, and agreements of the treaty in question were regarded by all the Departments of the Government as creating binding obligations, as fully appears from the fact that they all concurred in carrying the provisions into full effect. (Minis vs. United States, 15 Pet., 448; Porterfield vs. Clark, 2 How., 76.)
> Among other things it is recited in the patent that it is issued in execution of the agreements and stipulations contained in the said several treaties, and that the United States do give and grant unto the Cherokee Nation the two described tracts of land, as surveyed, containing the whole quantity therein mentioned, to have and to hold the same, together with all the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereto belonging, to the said Cherokee Nation forever, subject to certain conditions therein specified, of which the last one is that the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States if the said Cherokee Nation becomes extinct or abandons the premises
> Strong doubts are entertained whether that condition in the patent is valid, as it was not authorized by the treaty under which it was issued. By the treaty the United States covenanted and agreed to convey the lands in fee-simple title, and it may well be held that if that condition reduces the estate conveyed to less than a fee, it is void; but it is not necessary to decide that point, as it is clear that if it is valid, it is a condition subsequent, which no one but the grantor in this case can set up under any circumstances. (4 Kent Com., 127-130; Cooper vs. Roberts, 18 How., 181; Keneeth vs. Plumer, 28 Mo. 145.)

It appears, therefore, that the title was thus assured by this Government through Congress, by executive action, and under treaty covenants in the most solemn manner, and the faith of the United States pledged in relation to the government to be created by the Cherokee Nation over it in the following terms:

The United States hereby covenant and agree that the lands ceded to the Cherokee Nation in the foregoing article shall in no future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but they shall secure to the Cherokee Nation the right by their national councils to make and carry into effect all such laws as they may deem necessary for the government and protection of the persons and property within their own country belonging to their people or such persons as have connected themselves with them.

By the treaty of 1866 it was also agreed "that the judicial tribunals of the [Cherokee] Nation shall be allowed to retain exclusive jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases arising within their [the Cherokee's] country in which members of the nation, by nativity or adoption, shall be the only parties, or when the cause of action shall arise in the Cherokee Nation, except as otherwise provided in this treaty." (14 Statutes, page 803.)

For nearly fifty years this title has received due recognition by, and express approval of, the Executive Departments of the Government and the courts. Their existence has been and is recognized as "a domestic Territory—a Territory which originated under our Constitution and laws." (Mackey vs. Coxe, 18 Howard, page 100.)

As late as January 3, 1885, the then Secretary of the Interior, in a letter to the Senate (see Executive Document No. 17, second session Forty-eighth Congress), among other things, said:

The Cherokees have a fee-simple title to their lands, and they do not recognize the right of the Department to interfere in the management of their affairs with reference thereto. Patent was issued to this nation of Indians December 31, 1838, for their lands in the Indian Territory, under the provisions of articles 2 and 3 of the treaty of 1835 (7 Statutes, 428), and in accordance with the terms of the act of May 28, 1830. (Id., 412.)

"The land is theirs, and they have an undoubted right to use it in any way that a white man would use it with the same character of title, and an attempt to deprive the nation of the right would be in direct conflict with the treaty as well as the plain words of the patent. They are quite capable of determining, without the aid of the Interior Department or Congress, what is to their advantage or disadvantage, and the Government can not interfere with their rightful use and occupation of their lands, which are as rightfully theirs as the public domain is that of the United States, subject only to the provisions of article 16 of the treaty of 1866, which at most is only a contract to sell certain portions of the land; but until the Government settles friendly Indians thereon and pays for the land, the right of possession and occupancy is especially reserved.

"Under provisions of the treaty of 1835 the Cherokees adopted a constitution and organized a government, not on the plan of the former Indian government, but on a plan very nearly resembling that of the several State governments. This constitution provides for an elective chief and the election of members of the council and house of representatives.

"The right of the Cherokee Nation to control its property is especially guaranteed by the provisions of article 5 of the treaty of 1835, and the subsequent treaties. This is especially the case in the treaty of 1866, as may be seen by reference to article 16 of that treaty, wherein it is stipulated that the lands to be taken by the United States to settle friendly Indians on should be paid for at such price as the Cherokees and such friendly Indians might agree on, subject to the approval of the President of the United States. The rights reserved to the United States are clearly expressed in the several treaties, and the right of the United States to control the Cherokee property and prevent the nation from having the full and absolute control of the products of these lands is not even suggested. On the contrary, the Government guarantees, in article 26, as follows:

"'The United States guarantee to the people of the Cherokee Nation the quiet and peaceable possession of their country and protection against domestic feuds and insurrections and against hostilities of other tribes. They shall also be protected against interruptions or intrusion from all unauthorized citizens of the United States who may attempt to settle on their lands or reside in their territory. In case of hostilities among the Indian tribes the United States agree that the party or parties commencing the same shall, so far as practicable, make reparation for the damages done.'

"The Department has not considered it the duty of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior to interfere with the affairs of the Cherokee Nation, except in the case especially provided for by treaty with that nation."

I beg the indulgence of the House in this connection also to read a letter written by the then acting Commissioner of the Land Office, April 25, 1881, having reference to a scheme then being pushed by the so-called Freedmen's Oklahoma Association," and the difference between the movement then attempted and that contemplated under the present bill I leave gentlemen to observe after due consideration. I read from Executive Document No. 111, Senate, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1881.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference, of a copy of a circular purporting to be issued by the "Freedmen's Oklahoma Association," promising 160 acres of land to every freedman who will go and occupy the public lands at Oklahoma. This circular is signed in the name of J. Milton Turner, who is represented as "president," and by Hannibal C. Carter, who is represented as "general manager," of said pretended association.

It contains a letter from E. C. Boudinot, professing to state the legal character of the lands to which emigration is invited, and affirming that the same are public lands of the United States; that the Indian title thereto has been extinguished, and that the said lands were purchased by the United States for the use of freedmen as well as Indians.

The circular declares that the freedmen of the United States "have an undoubted legal right to enter and settle upon these public lands."

In compliance with your request for a report upon said lands, in view of the representations contained in this circular, I have the honor to state as follows:

1. There are no lands in the Indian Territory open to settlement or entry by freedmen, or by any other persons, under any of the public-land laws of the United States.

2. There has never been a period of time since the acquisition by the United States of the territory ceded by France that any of the lands embraced within the limits of the present Indian Territory have been open to settlement or entry by any persons whomsoever under any of said public-land laws.

3. The lands to which the United States holds the legal title within the Indian Territory are reserved lands by treaty stipulations and acts of Congress, and are not, and never have been, public lands subject to general occupation.

4. The entire Indian Territory, including the lands therein to which the United States holds the paramount title, is "Indian country," as defined by the first section of the act of Congress of June 30, 1854 (4 Stat., 729), which act prohibits unauthorized settlements in such country, and provides for the employment of the military forces to prevent the introduction of persons and property contrary to law, and for the apprehension of every person who may be in such country in violation of law (Revised Statutes, secs. 2111-2157).

The Indian Territory comprises a remaining portion of lands originally granted to, or reserved for, the use of certain Indian tribes, and constitutes a district created by the act of Congress of May 28, 1830 (4 Stat., 411), for the removal thereto of Indians from other localities.

The Territory is specifically described by geographical boundaries in the twenty-fourth section of the intercourse act (4 Stat., 733), by which act it was attached to the western judicial district of Arkansas for judicial purposes. (Revised Statutes, sec. 533.)

None of the land laws of the United States have ever been extended over said Territory, nor have any other general laws of the United States been so extended, except the criminal laws and the laws regulating intercourse with Indian country.

Prior to 1866 the whole area of the Indian Territory, except a small portion in the northeast corner, which belonged to the Senecas, Shawnees, and Quapaws, was embraced in the grants made and patented to the Cherokee, Choctaw, and Creek Indians under the treaties with said tribes, respectively.

The several treaties under which the title of the United States was conveyed to said tribes are as follows:

CHEROKEE TREATIES.

May 6, 1828, 7 Statutes, page 310.
February 14, 1833, 7 Statutes, page 414.
December 29, 1835, 7 Statutes, page 478.
Patent issued to the Cherokee Nation December 31, 1833.

CHOCTAW TREATIES.

October 18, 1820, 7 Statutes, page 210.
January 20, 1825, 7 Statutes, page 234.
September 21, 1830, 7 Statutes, page 333.
Patent issued to the Choctaw Nation March 23, 1842.

CREEK TREATIES.

January 24, 1826, 7 Statutes, page 286.
March 24, 1833, 7 Statutes, page 366.
February 14, 1833, 7 Statutes, page 417.
Patent issued to the Creek Nation August 11, 1852.

The treaties with the Senecas, Shawnees, and Quapaws were the treaties, respectively, of February 28, 1831, 7 Stat., 348; July 20, 1831, 7 Stat., 351; and May 13, 1833, 7 Stat., 424.

By agreements approved by the United States the Choctaws conveyed a portion of their lands to the Chickasaws, and the Creeks in like manner conveyed a portion of their lands to the Seminoles.

The titles of the several tribes under the foregoing treaties and agreements were subject to the following conditions:

First. That the land should not be conveyed by them except to the United States.

Second. If the Indians abandoned the land, or became extinct, the lands were to revert to the United States.

It was stipulated by the United States that the Indians should be protected in their homes and lands against all interference by any person or persons.

The treaties by which the United States reacquired title to any of the lands in the Indian Territory, or obtained the conditional right to control the disposal of any of said lands, were the treaties with the Seminoles of March 21, 1866; with the Choctaws and Chickasaws of April 28, 1866; with the Creeks of June 14, 1866; and with the Cherokees of July 19, 1866.

By the third article of the treaty with the Seminoles (14 Stat., 756), said Indians ceded to the United States about 2,100,000 acres of land, "in compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon."

In compliance with the same desire, the Creeks, by the third article of the treaty with that tribe (14 Stat., 786), ceded about 3,200,000 acres to the United States, "to be sold to and used as homes for such other civilized Indians as the United States may choose to settle thereon."

The freedmen referred to were the former slaves of Indian tribes. The treaty stipulations, as uniformly understood and construed, have no application to any other freedmen than the persons freed from Indian bondage. They relate exclusively to friendly Indians and to Indian freedmen of other tribes in the Indian Territory whom it was the desire of the United States to provide with permanent homes on the lands ceded for that purpose.

The lands reconveyed to the United States by the foregoing treaties are therefore held subject to the trust named. They can be appropriated only to the uses specified, and to those uses only by the United States, and then only in the manner provided for by law. Miscellaneous immigration even by the intended beneficiaries would be unauthorized and illegal.

The Choctaw and Chickasaw cession of April 28, 1866 (14 Statutes, 769), was by the tenth section thereof made subject to the conditions of the compact of June 22, 1885 (11 Statutes, 613), by the ninth article of which it was stipulated that the lands should be appropriated for the permanent settlement of such tribes or bands of Indians as the United States might desire to locate thereon.

The lands embraced in the Choctaw and Chickasaw cession were also included in a definite district established by the stipulations of the treaty of 1855, pursuant to the act of Congress of May 28, 1830, the United States re-engaging by the seventh article of said treaty to remove and keep out from that district all intruders.

Articles 15 and 16 of the treaty with the Cherokees (14 Stat., 803, 804) provide that the United States may settle any civilized Indians friendly with the Cherokees and adjacent tribes within the Cherokee country, on unoccupied lands, on certain terms and conditions specified in the treaty.

These provisions made the United States the agent of the Cherokees for the sale and disposal of unoccupied land in the Cherokee country for the benefit of said tribe, but restricted such sale and disposal exclusively to friendly Indians.

In pursuance of the stipulations of the foregoing compacts, and in the exercise of the trusts assumed by the United States under the several treaties, and in accordance with specific provisions of law and the lawful orders of the President, all the lands in the Indian Territory to which the United States has title have been permanently appropriated or definitely reserved for the uses and purposes named.

It is stated in the circular referred to me for examination that there are at the present time a large quantity, to wit, some 14,000,000 acres of public land in this Territory to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and that "these public lands are surveyed and sectionized, awaiting their intended use, namely, settlement and occupation by the freedmen of the United States, giving to each settler the fee-simple to a homestead of 160 acres."

It is essential for the instruction of those who may be uninformed, and necessary to the protection of those who are sought to be imposed upon, that the misleading features and false conclusions of the statements contained in said circular should be explained and exposed.

The main proposition set forth is that there are certain public lands in the Indian Territory, and the argument is that the rights of citizens to enter and settle upon the public lands must be the same in that Territory as elsewhere; and it is further asserted that colored people are especially protected in such rights as to these particular lands by the assumed purposes for which the lands were acquired by the United States.

That there are lands in the Indian Territory that belong to the United States in the sense that the United States hold the naked legal title thereto is true; but it is not true that these are public lands within the meaning of the public-land laws.

The term "public lands" is sometimes used in a general sense to designate lands the legal title to which is in the United States, in contradistinction to lands that are the private property of individual citizens. It is in this sense that the term is used in the surveying laws which require Indian reservations to be surveyed in the same manner as "other public lands." And the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his annual reports of surveying operations, includes the area of surveyed and unsurveyed lands in the Indian Territory in the tables of surveyable public lands in the same manner as all Indian reservations are included in each of the other States and Territories. But this does not mean that the surveyed or unsurveyed lands embraced in Indian reservations are public lands in the sense of the laws providing for the disposal of public lands. Under these laws the term public lands has a particular signification, and is used to describe such of the lands of the United States as are open to the public for general occupation, settlement, or entry.

All lands belonging to the United States are not subject to disposal, hence all lands belonging to the United States are not public lands within the meaning of that term, as invariably used in the public-land laws, and as the statutes are uniformly expounded by the courts.

Lands belonging to the United States, but which have been appropriated to any special use, or reserved for any purpose by act of Congress or executive proclamation, or withdrawn from disposal by lawful authority, are not public lands in the legal and proper sense of those words as employed to define lands subject to disposal to the public and open to occupation by the public.

Indian reservations, and all other reservations established by competent authority, are protected from entry or settlement by positive provisions of law, and both the State and Federal courts, in an unbroken line of decision, have always maintained the inviolability of such reservations.

The pre-emption and homestead laws authorizing entries to be made on lands belonging to the United States to which the Indian title is extinguished expressly provide, among other restrictions, that "lands included in any reservation by any treaty, law, or proclamation by the President, for any purpose," shall not be subject to such right. Hence the extinguishment of the Indian title to certain of the lands in the Indian Territory does not operate to open any of such lands to pre-emption or homestead settlement under those laws.

The title of the United States to lands in the Indian Territory is, as heretofore shown, subject to specific trusts, and it is not within the lawful power of either the legislative or executive departments of the Government to annihilate such trusts, or to avoid the obligations arising thereunder.

Such trusts are for the benefit of Indian tribes and Indian freedmen. The "freedmen of the United States" are not comprehended within the policy or intention of the treaty provisions, and said lands have accordingly not "been purchased for the use and occupation" of the colored people of any of the States.

Were it otherwise, and if in fact any land in the Indian Territory was intended for the settlement and occupation of colored people of the United States, it would require an appropriate act of Congress to carry such intention into effect. No legal settlement can be made on any lands of the United States except in accordance with some law, and no law exists under which colored people, any more than other citizens, can occupy lands in the Indian Territory, or be permitted to intrude themselves within that Territory.

For many years efforts have been made by designing persons to effect an ingress into the Indian Territory for the purpose of despoiling the Indians of the patrimony secured to them by the most solemn obligations of the United States. These unlawful and dangerous efforts have heretofore been thwarted by the prompt action of the Executive, under his constitutional duty to enforce the laws.

The present attempt to make use of the colored people of the country in the same direction, by deluding them with fictitious assurances that new and congenial homes can be provided for them within this Territory, deserves especial reprobation, since its only effect must be to involve innocent people in a criminal conspiracy, and to subject them to disappointment, hardship, and suffering.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. W. HOLCOMB,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. S. J. KIRKWOOD,
Secretary of the Interior.

And now, notwithstanding all these things, Representatives upon this floor are urging the passage of an act to create out of this Territory, with other lands, the Territory of Oklahoma, by a bill which, though we may admit it is inspired by pure and patriotic motives, can hardly fail of opening the way to flagrant violation of treaty covenants and stipulations, breaking down and overriding existing rights of persons and property and proving a most harmful and inexcusable breach of the nation's faith toward those civilized Indian tribes, who for fifty years have rested in the confident assurance and belief that this great Republic would prove faithful to her pledge that it would "forever secure and guarantee to them, their heirs and successors," the homes so conveyed.

We should remember that we are dealing with civilized tribes of Indians—five in number—embracing a population of about 65,000 persons, who, it may be asserted without question, are by reason of their advanced civilization—their advancement in agriculture and in the trades—no longer involved in the Indian problem. It is truly said that the very foundation of the proposed measure, so far as it applies to the five civilized tribes, is a misunderstanding of the relations of those tribes to the development and progress of the United States; that it is pervaded and poisoned by the erroneous assumption that these five tribes are, like the wild tribes of the plains, obstacles to the march of American civilization, a menace to the peace and safety of American citizens, and burdens upon the Treasury of the United States, and therefore, like those wild tribes, are involved in the great Indian problem which now, with such urgency, confronts the Government and people of the United States.

On the contrary, these tribes are wholly outside of that problem. So far as they are concerned it is contended that the impression that a present necessity or occasion for this legislation exists results, as does the structure of the bill itself, from momentary forgetfulness of accomplished facts in the history of those tribes. As to them I believe the whole Indian problem, so far as it has any present significance, has been virtually solved, and solved with eminent good fortune and success. They are no longer obstacles to the general advancement of American civilization and progress. It is claimed, with no little force, that they are in point of civilization in advance of the average of large classes of white as well as colored citizens of the United States. They are law-abiding and peaceable communities, and should not be condemned because other Indians, uncivilized and wild though they be, have shown no inclination or desire to cultivate the arts of their civilized brethren.

The Chickasaw nation, numbering about five thousand people, expend more than $50,000 per annum on their schools.

The Choctaws, with a population of about 18,000, expend about $60,000 annually on their schools.

The Cherokees, numbering about twenty thousand, expend about $80,000 each year on their schools.

The Creeks, who number about fourteen thousand persons, expend for the same objects about $47,000 per annum.

The Seminoles, numbering about twenty-seven hundred, expend annually for schools $7,500.

No part of all these moneys is contributed by the people or Government of the United States; and it is claimed that no other nations on earth expend so much per capita for educational purposes as these five civilized tribes.

They have their state-houses, their seminaries of learning, their orphan asylums, their school-houses, and their churches, in which they worship the same Being of whom divine guidance is invoked for this Congress at the opening of each daily session. They have all these emblems of the mental, moral, and religious growth and development of their people, and present them to the world as visible proofs of the progress made by them in civilization—greater progress, it is asserted, than that made by the Anglo-Saxon race in five centuries of its history.

And these are the people—a people numbering, as I have stated, in the aggregate sixty-five thousand or more—most deeply concerned in and most largely to be affected in their personal and property rights by the proposed act. But it is urged by the honorable gentlemen, in advocating this measure, the act shall not become effective unless these several tribes shall thereafter signify in a legal way their desire to be incorporated within the Territory of Oklahoma under its provisions!

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the very foundation of such an act on the part of our Government would be a monstrous wrong. Is it proposed in order that their civil and religious status may be improved? It appears abundantly that such is not the purpose. Is it that better law and order may be maintained? It is shown that the lawless and disorderly are ex-convicts and desperate characters from all the States, who flee thither to escape justice.

To meet that objection—to accomplish every purpose—we need only pass the Senate bill No. 624, now in the hands of House Committee on Revision of Laws, entitled "A bill to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas, and for other purposes." And Congress has full power to establish courts in the Indian Territory, and to transfer to such courts the jurisdiction as to such Territory now exercised by the courts located in Arkansas, Kansas, and Texas.

Is it proposed to create this Territorial government in order to more effectually dispose of the unearned railroad land grants?

Why not effect that purpose and object by express act therefore as is proposed in other cases?

In this connection let us call to the witness stand and briefly inquire as to the extent of existing railroad land grants.

We have here Mr. Sparks, Commissioner of the Land Office:

Q. 1. What was the total area of public lands June 30, 1885?
A. Approximate estimate can only be given; from the data at our command would fix it in round numbers at 250,595,684 acres.
Q. 2. What was the total area of the lands granted to railroads prior to June 30, 1885?
A. Estimated at 155,000,000 acres. Patented and certified to railroads, estimated, 55,000,000 acres.
Q. 3. How many acres have been granted to railroads in process of construction but not yet transferred?
A. There remains of the 155,000,000 acres granted to railroads about 100,000,000 not yet patented or certified to the railroads.
Q. 4. How does the area of the lands granted to railroads compare with total area of the public lands to-day?
A. About 68.3 per cent.
Q. 5. How does it compare with the area before any grants were made?
A. The amount granted to railroads is 11 per cent. of all public domain acquired by the Government.
Q. 6. What per cent. of the lands granted railroads was available for agricultural purposes?
A. Estimated at 75 per cent.
Q. 7. What proportion of the public lands to-day is available for agricultural purposes?
A. Estimated at 75 per cent.

Q. 8. How many actual settlers have taken public lands during the past year? How many in 1884, how many in 1875, and how many in 1865?

A. The only way this can be answered is to give the number of homestead and pre-emption entries, which were—

During past year	66,677
In 1884	76,331
In 1875 (estimated)	22,000
In 1865 (estimated)	12,000

Q. To what extent have the public lands increased in value since the land-grant railroads were constructed?

A. The only effect on the price to the Government is that within the granted limits to railroad odd-numbered sections being granted the price of the even-numbered section is put at double minimum, to wit, $2.50. It is not within the scope of the data at our command to say how much in real value the lands have been enhanced, the price fixed by the Government remaining unchanged except as above stated.

Q. 10. Can any estimate be found of the value of the lands granted to railroads?

A. A reasonable estimate would be an average of $5 per acre, which would make a grand total of $775,000,000.

Q. 11. Of this how much have railroads contracted to refund?

A. None.

Q. 12. How much has been paid?

A. None.

Q. 13. How much, if any, is now in default?

A. The railroads are not under contract to refund any of these lands. When there is a failure to comply with the terms of their grant it is for Congress to extend time of grant or declare a forfeiture.

In the foregoing the area of Alaska (369,529,600 acres) is not included.

It is contended that the creation of the proposed Territory and the contemplated extinguishment of existing Indian titles would operate to make effective certain railroad land grants, at least so far as the same may have become vested in the corporations concerned.

Is it to enable them to derive greater revenue from the sale or grazing use of their pasture lands—lands said to be of little or no value for any other purpose—that this Congress proposes to deprive them of the revenue now derived under the so-called grazing leases, and declare such void in advance of due judicial determination as to their rights to let their lands "for grazing purposes only?"

It is strongly urged that those lands should be, in due form, opened to settlement, that they are needed for "homes for the homeless." Let us look for a moment at our public domain.

In the Public Land strip we have 3,672,640 acres, over which the laws of the United States may be, at the will of Congress, extended, and which may be opened to settlement by due legal enactment.

We have in the States and Territories, exclusive of the Public Land strip, and excluding also the Indian Territory which contains 40,481,600 acres, over 200,500,000 acres surveyed and subject to settlement, as reported to June 30, 1883.

The surveyed and unsold lands lie in the following land States and Territories (estimated June 30, 1883):

	Acres.
Minnesota	13,383,813.10
Kansas	28,049,731.54
Nebraska	23,958,652.59

Wisconsin	5,440,338.19
Michigan	853,214.56

Total	10,957,983.03
Adding the	189,622,455.12
Aggregate	200,580,438.15

The estimated aggregate of unsurveyed land in the public domain is, exclusive of the Indian Territory and the Public Land strip, over 850,000,000 acres, divided between twenty-eight States and Territories.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman be kind enough to inform the committee how much of that land is of that character of arable land that an industrious settler can make a living from it for his family?

Mr. BAKER. I will proceed to show the situation as it was on the 1st of July, 1885.

Mr. SYMES. Does the gentleman mean he will proceed to show the situation on paper? That will not convey any idea to this House or to the country how much of that land the pioneer can settle upon, and make a home upon, and raise crops sufficient to support a family.

Mr. BAKER. My object in referring to these statistics has been to show how much has been realized from the public lands, and how much of the public domain remains.

Of the estimated area of the public domain there has been disposed of to June 30, 1885, as follows:

	Acres.

Even more than the aggregate in the schedule by States just given of lands actually surveyed and open to settlement under the homestead and exemption laws. Like my honored friend from Ohio, the able chairman of the Committee on the Territories, I deplore the fact that so many million acres of the public domain have been squandered in subsidies to railway corporations. I am opposed also to these great land corporations, into whose ownership and control such vast tracts have passed. I believe it is time for Congress to adopt speedily proper measures for the protection of the public domain and its preservation for settlement by our people, and not allow its ownership or control to pass into the hands of foreigners.

It may therefore be asserted, if done with due modesty, that there is no immediate necessity of forcing the five civilized Indian tribes to a voluntary (!) consent to giving up to white settlers the homes "guaranteed to them and their heirs forever" by the United States. Would it not be wiser and fairer to create the commission contemplated by the bill reported to this Congress by the honorable gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, on the 16th of March (Report No. 1076), which I have read with much interest, and defer any legislation of the character contemplated by this bill until such a commission may open the way through fair and open negotiations? [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7217) to provide for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. MORRISON. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD and that it be laid over.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolution referred to the committee was as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next the House of Representatives meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on each day.

The substitute reported by the committee is as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Monday, May 10, during the present session, the House shall meet each day at 11 a. m. and adjourn each day at 5 o'clock p. m.; but this resolution shall not interfere with any orders heretofore made for recess.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred a resolution proposing to fix the hour of meeting of the House at 11 o'clock on and after Monday, April 26, has had the same under consideration, and report back the same with a substitute therefor.

The substitute proposes that on and after Monday, May 10, the House, when it adjourns each day, shall adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on the day following, and shall adjourn at 5 o'clock each afternoon; but this resolution not to interfere with any orders for recess heretofore made.

The business of the House has accumulated to such an extent that the committee was of the opinion that it was necessary to add one hour each day to the time for its consideration; and it is believed by the committee that the designation of a particular hour for adjournment will facilitate the transaction of business.

When it is known that the House will be in session until a certain hour and will adjourn at that time, it is believed that a better attendance of members will be secured than when the hour of adjournment is uncertain.

TAXATION FOR PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. MORRISON. I present another privileged report from the Committee on Rules, and ask that the resolution and report be printed in the RECORD and lie over for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolution submitted by Mr. MORRISON, and referred to the committee, is as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be in order when any general bill or proposition to increase the rates or amounts of pensions or to grant pensions to persons not previously entitled thereto by law is under consideration to amend the same so as to provide by taxation or otherwise for the payment thereof; but no such amendment shall be in order unless the net revenue provided for shall be thereby set apart for the sole purpose of paying such increased pensions.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred a proposed amendment to the rules making it in order, when any general bill or proposition to increase the rates or amounts of pensions, or to grant pensions to persons not previously entitled thereto by law, is under consideration, to amend the same so as to provide by taxation or otherwise for the payment thereof, have had the same under consideration and report it back to the House without amendment, and recommend that it be inserted as clause 9 in Rule XXIII.

When it is proposed to permanently increase the annual expenditures of the Government for an unknown or indefinite period, it is the opinion of the committee that it should be in the power of the House to make provision at the same time for raising the necessary revenue to meet the obligations incurred. This is more especially required in the case of general laws granting pensions. General laws increasing pensions, or granting pensions to new classes of applicants, usually affect a very large number of persons who necessarily rely to a great extent upon the provision made by the Government for their support, and consequently a failure to meet such obligations at the times designated by the statutes would subject the pensioners to much inconvenience, and in many cases might cause actual suffering. The amendment to the rules, if adopted as recommended by the committee, will simply give the House the power to provide the means for the payment of such obligations in case it is found necessary to do so, and while such action may not be required in all cases, there may be instances in which laws passed for the benefit of the pensioners would become practically inoperative unless this power be possessed by the House.

REPRINTING OF REPORTS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Several members of the House have asked for the report of the Committee on Territories on the pending bill. The report is exhausted. I ask that it be reprinted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DUNN. I make the same request in regard to the report on the free-ship bill.

There was no objection, and the report was ordered to be reprinted.

Mr. KING. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 3, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Journal will be approved as read.

Mr. DAWES. I think there is a mistake in the Journal. Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, the Journal says, was instructed by the Committee on Claims to report certain bills. He may have been instructed by that committee, but he certainly was instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report bills of those titles. He may have had the same bills before the Committee on Claims; I do not know how that was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be corrected according to the fact.

Mr. DAWES. I am not certain what the facts are. The Senator from Arkansas is not in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will find out.

Mr. HOAR. I think the bills came from the Committee on Claims that he reported.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Arkansas was instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report bills of the titles which were read. I do not know but that there may have been the same bills before the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will ascertain what the fact is as to which committee the bills were reported from.

Mr. DAWES. Very well.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Supervising Architect in regard to increasing the limit of cost of the proposed public building at Wichita, Kans., to $100,000, as contemplated by Senate bill 1387; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 15, 1886, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office as to the payment of cost of survey by land-grant railroad companies in the State of Nebraska; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, inclosing a letter from the surveyor-general of New Mexico requesting Congressional action looking to the adjustment of private land claims in that Territory; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a supplemental report by the surveyor-general of New Mexico on the alleged private land claim of Bernardo de Miera y Pacheco and Pedro Padilla; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY BUREAU.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture; which was read, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1886.

SIR: A joint resolution approved July 5, 1884, directed the printing of 50,000 copies of the first annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry; 10,000 copies of which were for the use of the Senate and 35,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

I am to-day informed that of its 10,000 copies the Senate has received (some time in 1885) only 2,000 copies, and of its 35,000 copies the House has received (some time in 1885) only 285 copies, and that no delivery has been made to either branch within about one year.

I deem it my duty to state these facts in order to relieve this Department of any responsibility for what seems to be an unreasonable and unwarranted delay in the delivery of a report which Congress provided for nearly two years ago.

The second annual report of the Animal Industry Bureau is also in type, and will, I am informed, soon be delivered. For the great bulk of the distribution of these two volumes, to be distributed simultaneously, or for the great bulk of the distribution of volume 2 to get out ahead of volume 1, places this Department in an embarrassing position and subjects it to a reflection which is unjust. I therefore bring the matter to your attention in order to protect myself as far as possible.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Addressed to—
PRESIDENT pro tempore Senate United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Printing and printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the communication ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations. The reason why this printing has not been done is because there has been no appropriation made for it. The Public Printer has an appropriation made for the several Departments; of course he executes the most important work; and unless there is a special provision for this work, or unless the appropriations are added to, this work and other printing lies over from year to year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. I think that would be the wisest course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions adopted by the transportation committee of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Cincinnati, Ohio, in favor of the passage of the interstate-commerce bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also presents a petition signed by 100 members of the United Labor League of America, asking that the preamble and resolutions of the United Labor League of America returning thanks to Mr. Gladstone for his home-rule measure for Ireland be reported back to the Senate, and that they be printed in the RECORD for the use and information of the Senate. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLATT. I present the petition of Dr. Alexander Y. P. Garnett and others, a committee of the medical profession, representing that the International Medical Congress will hold its next session in Washington city in the month of September, 1887, and praying for an appropriation to enable them to be received and entertained. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented petitions of Granges No. 136, No. 89, No. 88, No. 735, No. 570, No. 114, No. 83, No. 1, No. 237, No. 25, No. 352, No. 606, No. 58, No. 326, No. 52, No. 737, No. 157, No. 297, No. 159, No. 693, No. 503, No. 715, No. 66, No. 608, No. 677, No. 101, No. 720, No. 782, No. 74, No. 122, No. 684, No. 620, No. 165, No. 153, No. 150, No. 271, No. 244, No. 442, No. 531, No. 41, No. 791, No. 108, No. 91, No. 63, No. 109, No. 96, No. 417, No. 200, No. 277, No. 215, No. 799, No. 67, No. 146, and No. 688, Patrons of Husbandry, of Pennsylvania, praying for the suppression of the manufacture and sale of all imitation dairy products; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CALL. I present a resolution of the Tampa Board of Trade, unanimously adopted at a regular meeting held April 28, as follows:

Whereas bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress to forfeit the land grant of the Florida Railroad Company, now the Florida Railway and Navigation Company, made by the United States Congress in 1855, to aid in building the said South Florida Railroad from Fernandina on Amelia Island to the waters of Tampa Bay, with a branch to Cedar Keys; and

Whereas after so long a time of patient waiting and hopes deferred the people of Tampa and South Florida now have pledges which they consider reliable that such road will be speedily constructed to the terminus at Tampa, provided a short period of extension of time is granted to its present manager; and

Whereas the completion of this road to Tampa is of the utmost importance not only to Tampa and South Florida but to the people of the entire State of Florida: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Tampa Board of Trade, representing the business interests of Tampa and vicinity, does most respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to so amend such bills as to extend the time for the completion of the Florida Railway and Navigation system to Tampa to the 1st day of March, A. D. 1887.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Cerro Gordo, Holmes County, Florida, praying for the forfeiture of the railroad land grant made to the State of Florida in 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL. I present a letter, in the nature of a petition, from E. W. Perry, of Crystal River, Fla., stating that—

A company of land speculators, calling themselves the "Homosassee Syndicate," are surveying all the coast lands in this county, even measuring every field of land cultivated by the settlers, representing that they do so by authority of Government, and that they are authorized to take up all the lands they may want regardless of any settlement that may have been made upon them; at least this has been so represented to me, and is the belief of the settlers.

The survey as made by the Government is said to be imperfect, many of the lines not having been run out, which makes it difficult to ascertain the numbers of many subdivisions. This "syndicate" is composed of wealthy men from all parts of the country. The poor settler will stand a bad chance in a controversy with these men.

The letter also states that this land has been donated to the State of Florida and does not properly come under the designation of swamp and overflowed land. The writer prays that some action may be taken by Congress in reference to this subject. I move that the paper be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL presented a memorial of Grange No. 88, Patrons of Husbandry, State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the admission free of duty of all agricultural raw materials; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a petition of citizens of Jackson County, Oregon, praying that an appropriation of $30,000 be applied in resurveying, shortening, and improving the military wagon road between Rogue River Valley and Fort Klamath by locating the same commencing at Gold Hill Station, on Rogue River, and extending up that river by way of Crater Lake to Fort Klamath; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I present a petition of the Board of Trade of Dalles City, Oreg., praying Congress to give all possible aid to bills which may properly come before it having for their object the completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia. The petition is signed by E. B. McFarland, president, and B. S. Huntington, secretary, and is a strong argument in favor of the early completion of this work. It states that for the year ending June 30, 1884, there was transported by boats on the Columbia and by the railroads along its banks merchandise amounting in value to $5,669,865, and various other reasons are cited why this improvement should be speedily completed. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6637) relating to contested elections, to report it with amendments. As this bill is a a matter which affects only the proceedings of the other House, I ask unanimous consent that it may be put on its passage at this time.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of the measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask leave to withdraw the bill for the purpose of putting the amendments in proper shape.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Delaware will have leave to withdraw the bill for the present.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report favorably the joint resolution (S. R. 55) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I should like to have the proposed article itself read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The article will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE XVI.

The term of office of the President and the second session of the Fiftieth Congress shall continue until the 30th day of April in the year 1889; and the 30th of April shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March as the commencement of the official term of the successive Presidents, Vice-Presidents, and Congresses of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that I was directed to report the joint resolution without amendment, but since the committee considered it, it has occurred to me that there should be one verbal amendment—that is, that instead of the phrase "the second session of the Fiftieth Congress" the words "the term of the Fiftieth Congress" should be substituted, as there may be of course some extraordinary session, which would make three sessions of that Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2) concerning Federal elections, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he reported a bill (S. 2297) concerning Federal elections; which was read twice by its title.

Combs and others, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to; and he submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2298) for the relief of R. G. Combs and others; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition in the case of Thomas Hamilton, a seaman of the United States steamer Victoria during the late war, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Public Lands I report an original bill, entitled a bill to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, and for other purposes.

The bill (S. 2299) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state that this bill covers the same ground and has the same title as a bill previously reported by the committee, and is intended to take the place of that bill. When that order of business is taken up I shall ask to substitute the bill now reported for the other measure.

The committee after receiving various suggestions in regard to the bill previously reported have reconsidered it and have made various slight amendments to the bill, and also some substantial amendments concerning the law known as the desert-land act, and instructed me to report a new bill.

I give notice that at an early day I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill for consideration, as it is an important measure and has been pending before Congress for many years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

UNITED STATES PRISON AT FORT SMITH.

Mr. BLAIR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to inform the Senate the condition of the jail used by the United States at Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, and especially with reference to the statements of Miss Anna L. Dawes, as contained in the circular issued under her signature from the Indian Rights Association in the month of February, 1886, annexed to this resolution.

INDIAN RIGHTS ASSOCIATION, OFFICE No. 1316 FILBERT STREET, Philadelphia, February, 1886.

A UNITED STATES PRISON.

From "Lend a Hand" (Boston).

Prisons or jails belonging to the United States itself are comparatively rare. The census of 1880 mentions but four, and the last report of the Attorney-General submits statements from these four, one of them being the jail at Washington city. The country has a right to expect that these few prisons under the control of the Government itself, supported by the nation and supervised by its own officers, shall be model institutions. We look to them for concrete examples of the latest discoveries in this direction. Penology is an exact science by this time, and some of its brightest triumphs have been achieved in our own land while American adepts teach willing audiences from many countries. It is interesting, therefore, to see what the United States considers the best system. With all the resources of the nation behind her, and all the wisdom of her famous students of this awful science to guide her, we look anxiously for her conclusions. We ask what system has been adopted, what employment provided for her criminals, whether they work for the State or for contractors, how their day is arranged, what punishments are allowed.

Innumerable questions of interest to the student of social science immediately present themselves at the mention of a prison under the management and control of the United States Government.

In the western part of the State of Arkansas is located at the flourishing city of Fort Smith one of the few prisons belonging to the United States. This large and growing town, in the midst of a beautiful region bordered by the Arkansas River, believes itself to be a coming center of great industrial interests. Already famous as the terminus of one celebrated railroad, it expects soon to be the meeting point of others, and to gather there much trade. Meanwhile it contains every facility for comfortable and luxurious living, and prides itself upon keeping abreast of the latest civilization. On the very borders of the Indian Territory, in its earlier days it was the depot for supplies for that vast reservation, and although its importance in that regard disappeared with the advent of the railroad which traverses the Territory itself, it still retains the United States court having jurisdiction over that region. Whatever crime against national law may be committed in a tract extending westward 150 miles and embracing a belt of country 200 miles wide is tried in this court, and accordingly whatever arrest is made by a United States officer among its 60,000 inhabitants, the criminal is brought to this place. It is easy to understand that the court is overloaded with business and its prison with criminals. The industrions and painstaking judge who sits on this bench is occupied, according to a recent statement of Mr. Garland, two hundred and ninety-seven days in the year, but the cases brought before him must still wait weeks and months for trial, so overburdened is the court. The jail is as full as the docket. Technically this place of detention is a jail, but though not a penitentiary it partakes in some respects of the nature of a prison, as will be seen. Its population is most heterogeneous. Here come men of all ages, accused of the gravest crimes or of the most trifling offenses. Here they await trial, and here, in many cases, they suffer punishment; a difficult situation needing most careful attention and most skillful arrangement, it would be said. What, then, has the United States done to supply the need? How is the prison arranged and situated? What system is employed?

The student of prisons and criminals must be particularly interested in this prison, so exceptional in its necessities and so unlimited in the opportunity for the best appliances and regulations.

The United States prison at Fort Smith consists of two rooms in the cellar of the Government building, with no light except what comes from underground windows, and no outside ventilation. In these two rooms were confined during the month of June, in this year, one hundred and nine prisoners; nine of them accused of murder, and two already convicted of that crime. This is the whole of the prison.

A fuller description of this extraordinary place, this piece of mediæval barbarity, only makes the horror worse. The Government building is a relic of the old military post, occupied as such until within twenty years. It is a large, low Southern house, once the quarters of the commandant of the post, built of brick, with stone foundations, and surrounded by wide verandas. Its rooms are used by the court and for similar purposes, and its cellar is the United States jail. The brick partition which supports the upper stories is the sole and only division contained in this remarkable prison. Each of the rooms thus made, or cells as they are called, is 55 feet long and 29 feet broad. Their height from floor to ceiling is at the utmost 7 feet. The small windows which light this black hole are at each end underneath the wide verandas. At one end of the jail the guard-room is located in front of them, but these windows are larger than those at the opposite end in the other room, being fully 6 feet by 3. Of course the solid partition between the two rooms prevents any draught. The climate at Fort Smith is that of interior Arkansas, a long, hot, dry summer, with the close atmosphere of a valley among low hills, without the Gulf breezes and lacking the strong winds of the open prairie. In early June the days were already stifling with heat and the nights were only relieved by a warm breeze that blew off the river across the localities most favorably situated. The amount of such a breeze which would penetrate under the wide verandas of a Southern house into a crowded cellar can be easily reckoned. Hoping to make the air more bearable the flag-stones of the floor are constantly wet down and the noisome air is heavy with the rising steam and dampness.

Into these reeking holes are crowded criminals of every age and degree. The court has jurisdiction over all crimes committed between the white men on the reservation, against white men by Indians, against Indians by white men under certain conditions, and over all infringments of the United States laws. Its prisoners are some of them full-blooded Indians, wild with all their savage passions and filthy beyond any Eastern conception; some are border ruffians who have lost none of their villainy or their loathsomeness in losing the picturesqueness of a past day; some are the low-lived, mean, and sneaking population who hover on the borders of this neutral country; some are hardened criminals of the worst type who have fled from the law of the "States" to seek refuge in the wilds of the Indian country; some are innocent boys brought here for a trifling theft; young men who, in a moment's rage, have broken the public peace; respectable tradesmen who have unwittingly infringed some stringent United States regulation about arms or liquor; innocent citizens accused by some revengeful neighbor and awaiting trial; outcasts whose crimes are beyond the possibility of mention; murderers who have been caught, not in their first, but in their fifth or seventh murder. It is literally true that at Fort Smith all these persons are confined in the same room, the close, unventilated, wretched place already described. Nor are the prisoners limited to those awaiting trial. In the midst of the desperadoes, the villains and the murderers, are all those criminals already sentenced whose terms do not exceed a single year. Those sentenced to a longer term are sent to Michigan. Happy the convict whose crime is large in the Indian Territory, for worse is a single year of Fort Smith than a cycle of Detroit!

Men who have been already convicted of murder are confined with the rest. There is absolutely nothing to hinder their free communication with their fellows. Five men are hanged at once in Fort Smith sometimes. At present there are nine men accused of murder in these two rooms, free to influence their companions, and like all the rest of their associates without the slightest check upon their opportunity to teach their horrid lore to young and old. The laws of the United States in regard to Indian reservations are very strict. No liquors may be sold in them, for instance, or carried there for sale, or given away. The temptation to break this regulation seems almost irresistible, by reason of the enormous profits resulting from such illicit trading, and often it happens that the man breaking this law is as young in years as in crime. Lads who have committed small thefts are also in this prison to-day, side by side with men under indictment for the most dastardly outrages known to justice. The average number in confinement is seventy-eight, and in June of this year, as has been said, the number had risen to one hundred and nine.

The only opportunity for washing given to this multitude of men is the single sink in each cell. There are no baths, only now and then some more fortunate prisoner is allowed the use of a coal-oil barrel sawed in two, this primitive wash-tub being the best that is afforded by the Government to this institution. The perplexed officials have tried many expedients to relieve the foulness of the place. The single bucket which serves the convenience of this considerable population is placed in a closet in the chimney, that the odors may be carried off through the only method of ventilation known to this jail. The prisoners spend their time as suits themselves. No work is possible. To relieve the tedium of the slow days, a mock court is held and men are tried for such offenses as spitting upon the floor, and, on conviction, are sentenced to sweep it. Recently one poor wretch suffered such an accumulation of sentences of this nature that he appealed to the court upstairs! The wooden cots and blankets which constitute the beds are put one side during the day, or serve as seats. When feeding time comes the rations are pushed through a slide in the door, and one after another these miserable beings retire to some corner like dogs to eat their portions. In the matter of exercise a regular routine is kept up. The prisoners divide themselves into squads, which march up and down the room at intervals; but be their stay there long or short, they see no ray of sunlight, they breath no single breath of outside air.

This dark, crowded, underground hole is noisome with odors of every description, dirty beyond description, horrible with all horrors—a veritable hell upon earth. What must it be for the sick? Impossible as it seems to credit the fact, the sick and wounded must live in these same rooms? There is no other provision for them, there is no other place where they can be put. There is "no refuge from the wild and ungovernable men around them," no relief from the close air, the eating and drinking and sleeping. It completes the picture to remember that small-pox is a disease very common to the Indian.

It should be made evident that for this state of things the people of Fort Smith are in no way responsible. It is a United States prison, and they have no more control over it than they have over the Capitol at Washington. They would welcome any attempt on the part of the Government to remove this plague spot, and substitute a suitable and decent jail. Nor are the officers to be charged with neglect or blindness. They do all that in them lies to remedy the evils, they make the best of the matter with no little thought and labor and painstaking. But here are the prisoners and here are the accommodations provided for them by the United States Government.

There is no question, shameful though the conclusion be, where the blame lies. The worst fact in the whole disgraceful series, is the fact that the National Goverment knows all about this horror. It can not even plead ignorance, for the report of the United States marshal in October, 1884, to the Department of Justice* contains a full statement of the matter, with all the particulars, the statistics and a diagram of the prison. What was done about it? In June, 1885, nothing had been done about it. There was no lack of money in the United States Treasury, for we had changed administrations on the ground of a surplus, and at this very town, the Government was just then selling the 300 acres which surrounded the original fort. There was no lack of facilities, for Fort Smith is large and well-equipped and situated on a great railway, and the officers for its court are able and distinguished. There was no lack of knowledge on the subject in a country which possesses such experts as Brinkerhoff, and Brockway, and Wayland, and a score of others like them, and in which prison conferences are annual occurrences.

What excuse has the Government of the United States to offer for the existence and continuance of this scandal?

ANNA L. DAWES.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I rise to ask the reconsideration of the resolution adopted a minute or two ago calling upon the Attorney-General for information as to the condition of the jail at Fort Smith. As that has been very fully stated on the floor of the Senate, and as both Houses, I understand, have passed a bill for a new jail, it seems to me unnecessary to put the Attorney-General to that trouble. I should like to move to reconsider the vote passing the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take it up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers are not at the desk.

Mr. HOAR. Let the matter lie for the present.

Mr. INGALLS. As the Senator from New Hampshire, who offered the resolution, has left the Chamber, it may be that he would like to be heard, and I suggest that the resolution lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table.

REPORT OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY BUREAU.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he hereby is, directed to inform the Senate the cause of the delay in furnishing to Congress for distribution the 50,000 copies of the first annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry as authorized by the joint resolution approved July 5, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Missouri that the Chair presented a letter to-day from the Commissioner of Agriculture explaining that matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then let the resolution lie on the table until I can see the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to call attention to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I think the Chair is perhaps under a misapprehension with reference to the communication received. I do not think there is any communication to the Senate from the Public Printer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Nebraska that the communication he presented was from the Commissioner of Agriculture, and not from the Public Printer.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is upon that communication that the resolution of the Senator from Missouri is based. I hope the resolution will be entertained by the Senate and referred to the Committee on Printing, so that the matter may be investigated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. In view of the fact that the Public Printer has already communicated to the Joint Committee on Printing his reasons for his action, I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing, and I think we can report almost at once concerning it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

POTOMAC RIVER BRIDGE AT ANALOSTAN ISLAND.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, directed to ascertain, as nearly as may be, the cost of the construction of an iron bridge for passengers and vehicles from a point on the east bank of the Potomac River across the Analostan Island to the west bank of said river, so as to connect the city of Washington with the Arlington estate; and also the cost and expense of converting the plateau belonging to the Arlington estate into a parade-ground; and transmit the same to the Senate with such suggestions and recommendations in regard to the same as may appear to said commissioners pertinent and proper.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I ask leave to read a paragraph from a paper published in Washington called the Post, in order that I may make an emphatic denial of one of the statements which it contains. It is headed "The nomination of Mr. Matthews," and reads as follows:

The nomination of Mr. Matthews was yesterday discussed by the Senate Committee of the District of Columbia, but was not disposed of. Senator INGALLS, in the course of a conversation with Senator RIDDLEBERGER Thursday, requested the latter to be present at the committee's meeting yesterday to make up a quorum and consider the Matthews case. This the Virginia Senator emphatically declined to do, saying that he would never help put a colored man in office against the wishes of the people most interested and that the quorum would not be constituted by his presence.

I care nothing for what the article contains except the word "colored;" and I take occasion here and now to state that I have never heard in committee or elsewhere any reference, nor have I myself made any reference, to race or color as a reason for or against the confirmation of Mr. Matthews. So the word "color" there was inserted for some other purpose than to state the position of any Senator relative to this confirmation.

As a rule of the Senate forbids me to state the reasons assigned and reasons still existing which occasion the delay of this confirmation, I will say that only time can develop the real reason. In the mean time I want it understood that I have never assigned such a reason as appears in this paragraph, nor have I heard any other Senator in committee do so.

Mr. INGALLS. As my name appears in the paragraph which the Senator has just read it is perhaps proper that I should say that this is the first time that I have ever heard of it, and it did not happen to attract my attention when the paper appeared. No such conversation as that narrated ever occurred between the Senator from Virginia and myself. I never had any conversation with any gentleman upon the subject, and so far as I am concerned the statement is an absolute emanation from the imagination.

ADDITIONAL LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. PLUMB. I yield for the Senator to make whatever motion he desires.

Mr. CONGER. I gave notice the other day that I would call up this morning, with the leave of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 6975) to establish additional life-saving stations. The Senator from Kansas tells me that he is limited as to the length of time of the debate this morning, and would prefer to have all the time. I ask that to-morrow morning, after the morning business, by unanimous consent the life-saving-station bill be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that to-morrow after the regular morning business the bill to which he refers shall be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. It is a very brief bill, and I presume will not lead to any debate. There is a great reason why it should be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to say a word upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa objects.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Connecticut says he does not rise to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] objected.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations under the head of "Office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails," after line 99, section 1, to insert:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a single question, as I was not present in the Senate when that part of the bill to which my question applies was passed over. I refer to the paragraph on page 3, between lines 46 and 57, inclusive. Unquestionably there is some object and purpose in the amendment in that paragraph. I am unable to understand its necessity or its object, and I should like to have the Senator explain it to me in order that I may comprehend it.

Mr. PLUMB. That, with the exception of the last part of the amendment, commencing in line 53 with the word "said," is the provision inserted in the bill of last year. It was supposed at the time that it was a continuing provision; it was the design of the committee to make it a continuing provision; but some doubt having arisen about it, it was deemed best to insert it again this year.

The purpose of it is to enable the Postmaster-General to make one contract for the transportation of the mails from Tampa in Florida to Havana in Cuba, a distance of about 320 miles, 95 miles of which lying between Key West and Havana is in foreign waters. Without a provision of this kind he would be obliged to make two contracts, one for the coast line between Tampa and Key West and the other for the foreign service between Key West and Havana. It was designed to make a continuous service, one single contract, in order that there might be no delay and in order that the benefits to be derived from the special facilities of the service north of Tampa might be realized in the dispatch of mails to Cuba.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator's explanation, so far as it goes, is very satisfactory. I presume the intention is to give extra compensation for carrying the mails between Tampa, Fla., and Havana. Under the bill would it not be possible—in other words, would not the construction necessarily be put upon the bill to apply to the terminal points named? We will say that one terminal point is New York city and the other terminal point is Havana. A steamship leaving the port of New York, touching at different ports along the coast at Tampa as the last of our domestic ports, running from there to Havana, would it not be entitled under this provision to receive a compensation of 50 cents per mile all the way from New York to Havana and back again?

Mr. PLUMB. It would not be possible practically to put on a service of that kind. In order to render that service a steamer would have to round the whole peninsula of Florida and go up into the Gulf of Mexico about 200 miles. It would not be a continuous service; it would not be a useful service; and it is not the service contemplated by the bill at all. The Senator will see that this is limited to a service where the domestic office is not more than 200 miles distant from the foreign office between which there is not a service. The distance between Havana and Key West is 95 miles I understand, and it could not therefore apply to any other two points than Key West and Havana.

Mr. McPHERSON. Would it not be better to state in terms then exactly what the bill proposes to do in regard to the service between Tampa, Fla., and Havana?

Mr. PLUMB. There would be no objection to that except there is a line of railroad in progress between Jacksonville and Charlotte Harbor, a point still farther down the coast, and it might be that during the next fiscal year the Postmaster-General would have the opportunity to make a service between Charlotte Harbor via Key West and Havana which would be cheaper even than the service via Tampa.

The provision was inserted last year at the request of the Department with a view of making, as I said, one continuous service between the two points, and it is desired by the Department to be repeated this year, except that the Department have specially asked that the limitation at the rate of 50 cents a mile be stricken out as a rate which would probably be insufficient and would at all events be likely to embarrass the service.

Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned on Friday——

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator propose to close the debate now?

Mr. PLUMB. The only agreement there is about closing the debate is the one entered into on Friday.

Mr. VEST. I know; but, as a matter of parliamentary courtesy, the opposition ought to be heard before the debate is closed.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not desire to speak now if others will speak. If there is any one who desires to speak I should be glad to have him speak now, in order that I may close the debate at a later period, but I do not care to have the Senate detained for the purpose of waiting upon anybody.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to debate again all the propositions which are involved in the amendment submitted by the committee; and but for the fact that several Democratic Senators have expressed their intention to vote for this amendment, when I know that those Senators are opposed to recognizing in any way the propriety of the present navigation laws of the United States, which prohibit any American citizen from purchasing a foreign-built ship, I should not address the Senate at all. I do not arrogate to myself any superior discernment or any superior industry when I state that the amendment proposed by the committee is absolutely antagonistic to the doctrine of free ships. A very brief examination of the existing legislation on this subject in the United States and of the amendment will make good this assertion. The Statutes of the United States, as they now exist, provide as follows:

SEC. 4007. The Postmaster-General may, after advertising for proposals, enter into contract for the transportation of the mail between the United States and any foreign country whenever the public interests will thereby be promoted.

There is no limitation upon this clause. The Postmaster-General may enter into contracts with any American or foreign-built ship for the transportation of the mails of the United States abroad, and this provision now existing is identical with the laws of Great Britain in regard to the transportation of the mails.

We have heard a great deal said here about subsidies paid by Great Britain. Mr. President, I do not propose to make an assertion, without any sort of exception, that money should not be paid out of the Treasury of the United States to encourage private enterprise. I can readily conceive a case in which private capital and private enterprise is not sufficient to carry out some great public policy and purpose. If I could to-day build an interoceanic communication between the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific and the Atlantic, if I could aid any corporation to bring about that communication by a liberal advance of capital from the Treasury of the United States, by a guarantee on the part of the National Government to private enterprise, I would willingly and readily, under proper restrictions, vote for such a bill. There are enterprises so gigantic and at the same time so necessary that the Government must use its vast capital and its unexampled resources in order to preserve the public interests, if not the public tranquillity. But this is not a case of that kind.

Much has been said of the course of England in paying subsidies to her great oceanic mail lines. Mr. President, I assert here, although it has been repeatedly stated to the contrary upon this floor and in the public press, that England has always advertised for contracts to transport her mails to all parts of the earth, open to all comers and without favoritism to her own people. But a few years ago a German company was the lowest responsible bidder for a British mail contract across the Atlantic Ocean to New York, and that company received it and carried the mails under that contract. To-day an American citizen can go to Great Britain and bid upon a mail contract, and if his bid is the lowest and he is entirely responsible the award will be given in his favor. Here in this legislation comes the same old question of confining the carriers to American steamships.

It is proposed now to change the existing statute of this country that permits a foreigner to bid here upon a mail contract, and substitute in its place that none but American steamships shall be permitted to carry the mails, and all competition is to be confined to American bidders. To-day we have but two routes on which there are two American lines, the one extending from San Francisco to the East, and the other from New York to Havana, so that no competition can come, except from those two lines, under the amendment now proposed.

I have read the provision of the Revised Statutes. That has no limitation. Now what is this amendment?

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships, for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

Nobody can bid except an American. It is a repeal of the existing statute upon this subject, and it is the assertion of the old doctrine incorporated in 1790 in the navigation laws, a relic of barbarism, that unless an American can build a ship himself he shall not go upon the ocean he shall not go abroad and buy his ship where he can buy it cheapest, and sail it under the American flag. Why, Mr. President, from the statements that have been made upon this floor we should be led to believe that the Government of the United States had paid nothing in the past as mail pay to oceanic steamship lines. The Government of the United States paid from 1848 to 1885 mail pay amounting to $32,184,950.57 to steamships for carrying oceanic mails, of which amount foreign vessels received $7,123,117 and American vessels received $25,061,832—nearly four times as much paid to the owners of American steamship lines as has been paid to foreign owners; and yet has that prevented our merchant marine from going down, until to-day it has reached a point of insignificance?

In 1855, 85 per cent. of the commerce of this country was carried abroad in American bottoms, and to-day 17 per cent. is carried in American vessels and the balance in ships belonging to foreign nations; and yet with a fatuity, with a blindness, with a recklessness that almost surpasses belief, the American Congress, under the leadership of the Republican party, have hung on to these obsolete and barbarous laws enacted in the infancy of our Republic, enacted at a time when they were in retaliation against the exclusive legislation of Great Britain; and day by day and hour by hour our ships and our flag have disappeared from the ocean. In the forest of masts to-day the American flag is not seen in the merchant marine and can not be discovered except floating from the masthead of some old wooden tug that would not last one minute before the armored vessels and the superior guns now manufactured for modern warfare.

Why, sir, our merchant marine and our Navy have gone down together. Look at the newspaper accounts the other day of our nautical drill off Pensacola. There were five old wooden hulks and a few torpedo-boats; and one of the vessels, the Brooklyn, took fire, and it took all the rest to put the fire out. When the torpedo-boats advanced upon the United States frigate, they actually had no electric light to illuminate the harbor for the purpose of protection, and they were forced to throw up the old bombs in order to give a light to the harbor and to the waves in order to see the attacking party. It was a roaring farce.

The Navy of the United States to-day amounts to nothing. We have no sailors. Hardly 5 per cent. of the sailors in the merchant marine are American citizens. From 1856 down to this time we have retrograded and gone back in the merchant marine and in the Navy. Since 1866 the Congress of the United States has appropriated $385,000,000 for naval purposes. Think of it! Three hundred and eighty-five million dollars since the close of the war. And to-day we have got some old wooden hulks that would not last one-half hour before one single armored vessel of a second-class naval power. Chili to-day has got superior war ships. Chili to-day has two vessels that could reduce to ashes every seaport city of the United States without receiving a single injury. Italy could send one war vessel here that could bombard our cities and destroy our Navy. And this is the result of $385,000,000 appropriated by Congress since the close of the war for the pay of officers and seamen and the repair and construction of naval vessels.

Mr. HALE. This is an old subject. The Senator and I have repeatedly been in controversy upon it. I want to ask him if he means to convey the impression that since 1866, after the war ended, there have been $385,000,000 appropriated that have gone into either the construction or repair of ships. Is it not the fact, as I stated the last time he made this speech, in answer to it, that nine-tenths of all that has gone into the regular maintenance of the naval establishment and has not gone into ships?

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes.

Mr. HALE. Well, state it that way.

Mr. VEST. I never said that all of it went into these old hulks. I never said it had been thrown away in the construction of vessels of green timber that warped inside of three months and caused them to be sold for firewood. I did say it had gone to the naval establishment, to the pay of officers and men that had no ships, to the support of the intellectual gentlemen—it is nothing to their discredit—who have been hanging about the city of Washington for twenty years, the ornaments of hops, and receptions, and routs, and assemblies, for they had no ships to go to, who could not find any place on ship's quarters under the flag—sailors without a ship, officers without anything but a flag on land; and I repeat again that under the control of the Republican party $385,000,000 have gone and to-day we have got this show, this variety establishment that we exhibited the other day at Pensacola. With as gallant seamen, with as gallant officers as any nation in the world—because the coastwise trade does furnish gallant sailors who are willing to go into the naval service if there were opportunities—we have no ships.

This condition was not caused by the war and by the Alabama and by Captain Maffitt and by Admiral Semmes. It commenced in 1856. The decline of American shipping has a cause antecedent to the hostilities between the United and Confederate States. It is proposed now, as it always has been proposed, to avoid the real reason for this decline. We are asked now to increase the mail pay. We are asked to turn away to everything but the real cause. We can not build our ships, the ships that are fit for the ocean, as cheaply as it can be done abroad. It is impossible for us to do it. Mr. Roach has told us over and over again for twenty years that he could do it, and Mr. Roach has never been able to do it. To-day you can not build an armored or freight vessel for oceanic travel within 20 or 25 per cent. on the Delaware of what you can build it upon the Clyde; and here we shut our eyes; we are helpless under the present condition of things. We know that this thing exists. We admit that it exists. We sent a commission to South America. They come back and report to us the vast resources of those countries and Senators rise here and read statistics by the hour to show the vast trade with Brazil, and Chili, and Peru, and say we must have it; but you do not get it, and why do you not get it? You can not build the iron ships that will take it.

In 1876 a merchant of Boston built two vessels under the American flag at a cost of 25 per cent. more than he could have bought them for in England. He built them for the trade with Chili and Peru. He loaded them with Yankee notions, went down to those countries, and sold his outgoing cargo at a fine profit. He then undertook to load his vessels with the productions of Chili, and he found that he must load with either wool or copper. These were the great staple productions of Chili and Peru. He loaded with them because sailors say that a vessel which sails loaded only one way sails into bankruptcy. He was bound to have a return cargo, and he brought back that cargo to his own country. When he arrived on the coast of the United States he found that the tariff duties were such upon wool and copper that his profit would be entirely destroyed, and he sailed to England, sold his wool and sold his copper to the English manufacturers.

I made this statement here once before, and I very well remember that the junior Senator from Massachusetts said yes, but let the Senator from Missouri state whether or not that same American merchant could not have gone into the trade between foreign ports. Yes, Mr. President, he could have gone into the trade between Liverpool and Peru, he could have gone into the trade between Spain and England, but what we want is American builders to build ships for the American trade, not only on the principle of dollars and cents, not only to make money in the venture, not only to save one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty million dollars that we pay annually on our commerce taken abroad, but in order to build up a navy, in order to have sailors under the American flag who are ready in the event of war to defend the honor of the country.

England, when she made the contract with the Cunard line of steamers and with the great Oriental line that has thirty-seven vessels, put into those contracts the provision that British naval officers should be carried upon those ships and should command the crews in order to establish out of the sixty-odd thousand sailors in the merchant marine of Great Britain a force of marines ready at any time to defend the British flag and to carry it in honor and safety over the world.

Now, Mr. President, I say deliberately that increased mail pay does not give us naval vessels, and I say this amendment is simply an assertion of the old spirit of the navigation laws which excludes the American citizen from the right to purchase a ship where he can purchase it cheapest.

I do not propose to discuss the tariff. I will dismiss it with one single remark. The whole principle of levying money upon any American citizen over and above the limitations of the necessities of the Government for revenue, is robbery under the form of law. If I am compelled to pay one dollar more for the coat upon my back to any tailor in any State or in any city of this Union than I would be compelled to pay to another, that being a contribution to the Government over and above my distributive share of the taxes necessary to support this Government, that law robs me of one day's labor; it takes one dollar's worth of bread and meat out of the mouths of my wife and children. I am compelled to bear my proportion of the public debt of this country. As an honest man and a loyal citizen, I am ready to pay it; but when the revenue of the country amounts to so much, let it be distributed fairly among the different States and sections of this great confederacy of States; but when any Congress or any party goes beyond the limits of the revenue necessities of the country and makes me give up my toil and my labor to protect any man, whether he be laborer or manufacturer, I say now and here it is robbery under the form of law.

The principle of incidental protection within the revenue limit is just. The high protective principle urged by the Republican party, and by some Democrats as well, I am sorry to say, on the people of the United States, is a proposition that I shall always denounce. Why should I pay John Roach or Mr. Harlan $50,000 out of my pocket in order to build a ship under the American flag when I can go abroad and buy that ship and save that $50,000 to myself and family? Mr. President, it has resulted in the destruction of the merchant marine of this country. Blind to the most ordinary common-sense principles that govern the ordinary men of the country, we go on blindfolded, as it were, to certain destruction of the American merchant marine and the American Navy.

Mr. President, what would be thought of a physician who continued to pour down the throat of an unwilling patient dose after dose of a certain medicine when he saw the vital energies wasting away under it day by day, and death with noiseless and inevitable step clutching the throat of his victim? What would be thought of the charlatan who persisted in a course that each day emaciated the patient and each day brought him nearer death? Would he not deserve execution as a public criminal? What are we doing and what have we done? We found out at least by 1866, after the close of the war, that we could not compete with Great Britain in iron ships. Did we pretend to take any other course than the old navigation laws of 1790? Did we propose to change the treatment? Did we saw away these old navigation laws and hunt for some new and appropriate remedy? Look at the difference between the statesmanship of Great Britain and the United States. It is not a question of what we want; it is a question of what we must do. It is not a question of the flag, and the star spangled banner, and the stripes that should float above every wave of the ocean. It ought to be presumed that every one of us wants it to float, wants equally to preserve the honor of this great country. It is a question of what is inevitable; it is a question of what we know; it is a question of necessity. The only thing presented to us now is, whether we shall learn from the past or whether we shall forget our folly in the future.

From 1840 to 1851 the United States steadily gained upon Great Britain as to the carrying trade and the merchant marine, and why? Because the constituents of my friend from Maine, with their immense forests of nautical timber could build a wooden vessel superior to any manufactured upon the face of the world. The Baltimore clipper ships dominated the ocean, and Great Britain year by year saw the scepter of the waves departing from her. In 1851 England came to the conclusion that the fight was against her, and even prior to that time, in 1849, England repealed her navigation laws similar to ours, which provided that every vessel that sailed under the British flag should be built by a British citizen, and should not be purchased abroad. England in 1849 repealed her navigation laws and said to her people, we can not compete with the Yankees in building wooden vessels; now go and buy their vessels from them; and we sold millions of dollars' worth of vessels, built in Maine, to the English merchants and ship-owners. What was the result? England still continued to press even a little ahead of the American merchant marine, and I desire to read from the best imaginable authority. I take it, with my friends on the other side, from no less a person than Mr. John Roach, who has been eulogized as the greatest and best of all the American citizens interested in this subject. I read from a pamphlet called The American Carrying Trade, by John Roach. Mr. Roach says:

1833 TO 1840.

Our commerce had grown in 1836 to $480,000,000, doubling itself in twenty years. Our tonnage increased in still larger proportion. In 1840 it was over 2,500,000 tons. We had also sold over 400,000 tons of shipping abroad, by this means bringing to the country $25,000,000 in gold, 90 per cent. of which was paid to American labor. Of our carrying trade at this period it has been well said "that its vast profits laid the foundation of the wealth of the country and built up its merchant marine with a rapidity unequaled in the history of the world."

By 1840 England's statesmen were alive to the danger of her position.

* * * * * * * *

Despite all these efforts they saw that the United States had already grown to be the second carrying nation of the world, had the raw material, mechanical skill, and energy to spare, and promised to become the first.

* * * * * * * *

In 1850 we had a tonnage of 3,335,454, an increase of over 200 per cent. since 1815. Our coasting trade, from which foreign ships were excluded, employed 1,900,000 tons of shipping, an increase of nearly 400 per cent. in the same period.

Now mark—

All this while England was paying $4,000,000 a year to her fast steamships, which were intended to drive our clippers from the sea.

Four million dollars of increased mail pay, and yet during all this time the American flag was steadily gaining upon that of Great Britain; and if we come to details we shall find that in 1848—I ask the attention of Senators to find out whether this increased mail pay is the remedy—in 1848 the United States paid in bounty to vessels sailing under the American flag $100,500, and England paid for ocean postal service the same year $3,250,000. In 1849 the United States paid $235,086 and England $3,180,000. In 1850 the United States paid $619,924 and England $5,315,985. In 1851 the United States paid $1,465,818 and England $5,330,000. In 1852 the United States paid $1,655,240 and England $5,510,635.

And so on in the same proportion to 1858. Now, let me put a question to the advocates of this amendment. They say this is the remedy; they say that this opens up new avenues of trade, that with our present navigation laws unrepealed increased mail pay will bring back our flag within a limited degree to the ocean. I want to know why we had such an era of unexampled prosperity and advancement of the American flag up to 1858, when we gained upon Great Britain, when we paid no subsidy or increased mail pay, and England expended these vast amounts? If the argument be a correct one, and this is the remedy, why was it that, without paying a single dollar, almost each year we continued to gain upon the British in the struggle for maritime supremacy? We gained upon them in spite of our paying no subsidies. We gained upon them because we could build better ships under the existing condition of the world on the ocean at that time. We built better wooden ships than Great Britain could build, and she bought them from us.

In 1851, and even before that some years, Great Britain commenced the construction of iron ships, and Great Britain excels us as much to-day in iron ships as we excelled her up to that time in wooden vessels. But our statesmen refused to learn from the past. They refuse to-day to do what Great Britain did, permit the American citizen to buy what he can not build as cheaply as they can. Do you ask me the reason? For the purpose of this argument it makes no difference. The facts exist and you can not answer them. You can not build within 20 or 25 per cent. of what England can.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I have never claimed that subsidy alone revolutionized the commerce of the world, but I have claimed that every power that has sought to increase its commerce has resorted to subsidy. Does not the Senator know—and it is pertinent to what he was saying—fixing, as he does, the time when English commerce and her mercantile marine took a lurch ahead, that that immediately followed the large increase by the British Government of subsidies? Does he not know that the ascendency of American trade and the comparative falling off of British commerce was what alarmed the British ministry of the time, and that in 1848 it began to increase subsidies and continued to so increase, and that, just as he says, in the years immediately succeeding, the commerce of Great Britain began to increase and that increase proceeded pari passu with the subsidies which she paid? If he does not know that, he has not looked at the figures, and it is precisely in the line of what he is saying, except that he does not give these facts which I now give. That is, when the ascendency of the British mercantile marine began to be shown to all the world, following her system of subsidizing lines, not only the Cunarders to the Atlantic coast of the United States, but the other lines all over the waters of the globe, and Great Britain reaped her reward. I do not say that it was all from subsidies, but they were a part and parcel of the result.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, I have studied this question of the merchant marine and the reasons for its decline, and the remedy, if any exists; and I have never heard any such statement before as that made by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator deny it?

Mr. VEST. I do deny most emphatically.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator deny the statement?

Mr. VEST. I deny the fact. The Senator believes it, but it is not the fact.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator deny that in 1848 Great Britain began to increase subsidies, that she subsidized the Cunard line at the rate of $400,000 a year, and from that increased her subsidies so that she was soon giving at the rate at one time of nearly $6,000,000 a year; that her commerce increased during this time—does the Senator deny that?

Mr. VEST. I deny emphatically that the advantage which Great Britain has over us, commencing from 1851 or 1852, came from subsidy.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator deny the statement I have made that the subsidies were given as I stated, and that the increase of British commerce continued along with subsidy? He may draw one inference and I draw another, but the statement I have made can not be denied.

Mr. VEST. Great Britain had continued her subsidy system long before 1848.

Mr. HALE. Not to any great extent.

Mr. VEST. She commenced giving subsidies back in 1837 and gave sometimes greater and sometimes less; but the subsidy system has existed in Great Britain since 1836 or 1837. Mr. John Roach has stated it over and over again. Subsidies made no difference between the American and British merchant marine, as the figures show. It was the invention of iron ships by Great Britain which redeemed her from the disadvantage which had been placed upon her by the construction of wooden vessels in the American ship-yards; and when she commenced the construction of her iron merchant marine, from that very day, commencing, say, in 1854, England took away from us any chance of competing with her unless we had the same sort of facilities with which to meet her.

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri one simple question. Do I understand him as confessing that the English, the German, and French Governments shall have all the commerce with the South American States?

Mr. VEST. I do not.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well. The Senator has cited a case in which an American merchant built two American ships, took them to South American ports, and sold a cargo there, because I take it no government has an advantage in those markets. There are no reciprocity treaties with those governments. The Englishman, the Frenchman, the German, and the American stand on exactly the same terms at a South American port. But the Senator says the return cargo of this American merchant was forced to a British port for sale. Then as a matter of course upon that reasoning the Englishman has an advantage over us to-day in the South American trade.

Now, what else does Great Britain do to help that? Great Britain to-day subsidizes the royal steamship line, running between her ports and South America, to the extent of $450,000. In addition to the advantage the Senator himself has cited as against American commerce, Great Britain gives a subsidy of $450,000; and how does she collect it? She assesses it upon her colonies, upon Barbadoes, upon Bermuda and the other West India Islands; and the ship sailing from Southampton or Liverpool runs to the English colonies, discharges her cargo, takes the mail, runs down the coast to the River Plate; and what is she loaded with? She loads with British manufactured goods and with British products. She sells them in the South American market and she loads for our ports with goods admitted duty free here, say rubber and coffee. She goes to the port of New York and she takes a load of our goods from there to Liverpool. Thus there is a triangular line subsidized to the extent of $450,000 in addition to the advantage which the Senator says exists against us.

Now I want to ask the Senator from Missouri just this one simple question. If there is anything the American people above all other things in this world want to-day, it is a market for their surplus products. Now pray tell me, confronted as we are by that condition of things, with the advantage, which I say is a great advantage in favor of the English commerce in South American ports, and in addition to that subsidies of $450,000, the English Government last year made $150,000 out of the line and then assessed her colonies along the South American coast to make it up. How are you going to get that trade? That is the question. I ask the Senator how are you going to get it?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, we shall never get it under the present condition, and shall never get it by giving $800,000 a year for mail aid. I can tell the Senator how I would get it if I could frame the legislation myself. In the first place, I would repeal these infamous navigation laws. I have heard a great deal about "the twin relics of barbarism—polygamy and slavery." Here is a triumvirate of barbarism—polygamy, slavery, and the navigation laws. They were born in sin and conceived in iniquity. These navigation laws were the result of the bargaining between South Carolina and Georgia on the one hand and the New England States upon the other, by which the slave trade was perpetuated until 1808, provided the South would agree to consent that it did not require two-thirds in Congress to enact the navigation laws. These navigation laws are to-day against the sentiment of the civilized world; and no other civilized nation to-day pretends to have them upon her statute-book.

In further answer to the Senator from New Jersey, I would not only repeal these laws and let an American citizen buy his ship where he could buy it cheapest, but I would try something else besides the medicine that has brought us nearer and nearer to the grave for thirty years. I would reform the tariff. I would let a man take his ship to Peru, load with copper and wool, bring that cargo under the American flag to an American port and put it into the hands of his own countrymen to manufacture. I would bring down this tariff to the revenue basis, and I would preserve the spirit of our institutions and of the Constitution, which says to every man, "All the Government proposes to do is to give you an equal chance in the race of life, and not to handicap one man to the advantage of another, or one section to the advantage of another." To-day England obtains the trade of the world because she gives an equal chance to all her citizens, and because her laws are just and equitable and based upon a proper common-sense business principle. England has a vast colonial system, and is obliged to carry her mails to all portions of the world, and she gives increased mail pay in consideration of increased service.

I have never believed that that statute was just or equitable which forces an American ship to carry the mails for 4 or 5 cents a letter to any portion of the world or refuses her a clearance. I voted for the repeal of that law. I believe in honest mail service to-day, and I believe honest mail service can be maintained under existing legislation. What is this amendment? It is to retain the navigation laws by an insectivorous appropriation of $800,000 to make up for the violation of a great principle, and a principle based upon sound common sense.

Mr. President, the leaders of the Republican party have recognized the necessity for a change of these laws, but so sensitive are our Republican friends as to the doctrine of protection that they are unwilling to break one single link in the chain that binds the union of American merchants, manufacturers, and ship-owners for fear that the whole fabric will tumble to pieces. I remember that for seven years since I have been in the Senate we have been told that if we reformed the navigation laws as to tonnage, as to the wages of seamen, as to pilotage, and as to the expenses of sailing a vessel, American enterprise, American capital would soon compete with England. Two years ago we repealed those portions of the laws, and one amendment which I had the honor to offer myself swept away a portion of this infamous navigation system which required an American vessel which shipped its crew in a foreign port to discharge that crew when it reached an American port and re-employ them, thereby putting money into the pockets of the shipping-commissioners and the boarding-house keepers. The superintendent of the International Navigation Company, Mr. Griscom, of Philadelphia, stated to us that if that single amendment were made it would go very far toward restoring or at least starting our merchant marine upon the ocean.

We did repeal them, and made all these other amendments that were demanded by the shipping interest of the United States; and what has been the result? In the last two years the decay in the American merchant marine has even been more rapid than in any two years before; and now, mark it! the International Navigation Company, known as the Red Star line, had ten American steamships put under the Belgian flag, and as they were built or bought with the money of citizens of Pennsylvania to the extent of $5,000,000, and only one-fifteenth of the stock of the company was owned in Belgium, the ten steamships were put under the Belgian flag in order to avoid the result of the navigation laws of the United States, and Mr. Griscom—I read his letter, and I have it here—states that the difference between running one of those vessels under the American flag as the law stood a few years ago and under a foreign flag was $15,000 a year upon each ship, making a difference to his line of $150,000 a year on ten vessels.

We repealed these odious provisions as to tonnage and as to the fees of commissioners, but the decline has continued, and now, mark the sequel! Mr. Griscom comes now for the International Navigation Company and offers a bill to the Senate, which is pending, proposing to put his vessels back under the American flag provided——

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator, I think, does not exactly understand that those ten ships were built in the United States.

Mr. VEST. No; I say they were bought with capital of citizens of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. You said he came here asking to put them back under the American flag. Your first allusion to it was that he had put ten American ships under the Belgian flag.

Mr. VEST. I meant that they were bought and paid for with American money, the money of American citizens; that it was an American enterprise; that when they came to put a flag over the vessels they put a foreign flag on account of the difference in the cost of running the vessels. I have Mr. Griscom's letter here, and I feel like reading it. We offered to make up this difference; that is, to remove it, and I labored as earnestly as any member of the Senate to bring about that result, and what is the consequence? The merchant marine continues to decrease. Mr. Griscom comes now with a bill asking the privilege of putting these vessels under the American flag, and so far there could be no objection to it. No Senator here, no matter what his political preference, would for a minute pretend to say that these steamships should not be put under the American flag if possible.

But Mr. Griscom asks one other thing. He asks that if one of these vessels after being put under the American flag should become disabled or destroyed, either be sunk or be burned, then his company should have the privilege of buying another steamship wherever it could, upon the cheapest terms, and put that in the place of the one that had disappeared. That single section in that bill causes every manufacturer, every high-protective tariff man in Philadelphia to rise simultaneously and protest against the passage of the bill. They were willing these vessels should come under the American flag—oh, yes—but they were unwilling that if one of them should be sunk or disabled, this company should be permitted to buy another steamship in the best market and for the lowest price. In other words, the men who remonstrated against this bill were determined that not one single iota, not one single letter of the high-protective tariff system of the United States should be touched either in manufacturing or shipping.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and his colleague now occupying the chair [Mr. FRYE] love the coastwise service of the United States. They say there is an example of the exclusive system and of the advantages of such system. Why, Mr. President, I believe the coastwise trade of the United States would flourish in a greater degree if the men who put ships into it were permitted to buy them where they could buy them cheapest. But it is not proposed now to touch that trade. We are talking simply of the foreign trade of the United States, which has fallen to 17 per cent., while our commerce has steadily increased.

But I was proceeding to say that the leaders of the Republican party recognized the difficulties in our way with the navigation laws remaining. Here is Mr. Blaine's panacea. In his letter to the merchants of New York in regard to the coastwise trade he says:

> We can build wooden ships better than any other country, and we can build them as cheaply; but after they are launched and in trade they should not be worried, and harried, and burdened with every form of taxation, port-charge and quarantine exaction at home; and maltreated and oppressed, as they too often are, by our consuls in foreign ports. They should have every facility for supply in our ports that England gives to her ships."

> We must have iron steamships besides, and with the start that other nations enjoy to-day we shall never compete with them, unless we use the same aids and the same instrumentalities that have built their steam fleets. And that aid I would give. And to give it effectively and wisely I would abandon all idea of granting subsidy to special lines as they apply to Congress for aid. That policy, however just and meritorious, will always be rendered abortive by prejudice, by jealousy, and by scandal, either actual or imputed. I would prefer a general law that should ignore individuals and enforce a policy. For instance, enact that any man, or company of men, that will build, in an American yard, with American material, by American mechanics, a steamship of 3,000 tons, and sail her from any port of the United States to any foreign port, he or they shall receive for a monthly line a mail allowance of $25 per mile per annum for the sailing distance between the two ports; for a semi-monthly line, $45 per mile; for a weekly line, $75 per mile. Should the steamer exceed 3,000 tons, a small advance on these rates might be allowed; if less than 3,000 tons, a corresponding reduction; keeping 3,000 tons as the average and the standard. Provide that the steamships shall be thoroughly inspected by a competent commission, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster-General, and thus insure the very first class of construction for safety and for speed, both for passenger and cargo.

There Mr. Blaine does not recommend increased mail service or increased mail pay, but he recommends a subsidy based upon tonnage, such as the French have tried and in which the French have failed. Germany pays no subsidies, and yet the merchant marine of Germany is increasing from day to day in numbers and in efficiency. France has adopted the same system which Mr. Blaine recommends, and the result is that to-day France is making no progress in her merchant marine, notwithstanding the increase of her subsidy system. But I read again a recommendation made by the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], when he was Secretary of the Treasury, I believe in his last report while he held that office. Mr. Sherman said, in his report to Congress:

> It has always been the policy of the law to restrict the privileges of American registry to vessels built in this country. The object was to further the shipbuilding and naval interests of the country, and this policy was so successful as to advance the United States to the second rank among nations as respects tonnage and the number of its ships. While wood was the article mainly used in the construction of ships, we had the advantage over foreign nations in the cost of material. Our ship-builders could not only supply vessels for domestic commerce, but could successfully compete in the carrying trade of the world. The use of iron in ship-building in place of wood is, however, steadily increasing, and in the cost of iron and in the price of labor other commercial nations have the advantage. It is a grave question of public policy whether the period has not arrived when the unlimited right of purchase, as under the English statutes, should be extended to vessels as well as to other commodities, and when admission to American registry upon the payment of duties should be allowed them upon importation. The recovery of our old position in the carrying trade will more than counterbalance any disadvantage likely to ensue from a modification of restrictions upon the right of purchase, while a moderate duty on ships imported will enable our ship-building to compete successfully in the construction of iron vessels of the largest class. The proper policy to be pursued is difficult to determine, but the great importance of considering the subject is respectfully submitted to the attention of Congress.

Mr. FRYE. I was in the chair when the Senator from Missouri made a statement that Germany paid no subsidy, as he called it. Germany has just appropriated $1,100,000 to one line. A communication received from the State Department about ten days ago, referred to some committee, I have forgotten which, will give the information.

Mr. VEST. I know it to be a fact that after France had what is known as her subsidy law giving a certain amount of subsidy for tonnage, Bismarck recommended to the Reichstag that a similar law should be enacted by Germany, and the merchants of Hamburg and of the other cities engaged in shipping in Germany rose as one man and protested against it, and it did not receive a vote in the German Parliament or Reichstag—not one, and Bismarck withdrew it. And if any such subsidy has been granted within the last ten days, I have not heard of it, and it is beyond my belief. Of course the Senator is confident in his statement that as Germany has increased her merchant marine without subsidy she should now proceed to that policy. France has gone back under it. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] read the other day an official statement here showing that notwithstanding the subsidy system France has failed to build up her merchant marine.

Mr. FRYE. France has not given up her bounty system. I call the attention of the Senator to the distinction between the two. I call it mail pay where you pay a ratable price for carrying the mail. I regard the English price as reasonable. When I say Germany has subvented I mean she has provided $1,100,000 for carrying the mail by one line, and I think the Senator will find the contracts will be here before the discussion is over. France has not given up her mail-pay, not a dollar of it, nor declared it a failure; neither has she given up her bounty system, which is another thing entirely.

Mr. VEST. The law of France which pays a bounty to every citizen that builds a steamship, whether built at home or abroad, is yet upon her statute-book; but I assert here that it has not built up her merchant marine, and to-day she is behind Germany and immeasurably behind Great Britain. That is the assertion I make.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator know that from 1870 to 1883 the French commercial marine rose from 154,415 tons in the first year that I have named to 667,474 tons in 1883, and that the present year France is paying annually to the steamers which carry its mails $4,600,000? She pays $1,714,604 to the Japan, China, and India lines; $728,000 to the South American lines; $950,000 to the Mediterranean lines; $790,000 to the Mexican and West Indian lines; and $500,000 to the New York line, and other sums smaller to smaller lines. Yet the Senator says that her commerce has not increased, that she has abandoned subsidies!

Mr. EUSTIS. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. HALE. The report of the Central and South American Commissioners, House of Representatives, Executive Document No. 226, Forty-eighth Congress, second session.

Mr. VEST. France has been paying that mail pay for years, and still falling behind with her merchant marine. This mail pay or subsidy as the English call it—for they call all mail pay subsidy—we attach an American meaning to the word as a bounty paid out of the Treasury to increase private enterprise, but they call all mail pay subsidy.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator mean by saying that France has fallen behind in her mercantile marine in the face of this statement from official figures?

Mr. VEST. I mean to say that France has not increased in proportion with the other maritime nations of the world.

Mr. HALE. She has increased in larger proportion than any other European country, except possibly Germany. In these years I have given she almost quadrupled her mercantile marine.

Mr. VEST. I assert here that while France has increased her tonnage, her trade has fallen off; and if that be so, as it is, and if mail pay is the remedy, as my friend says, why to-day is it that she has adopted this bounty law, and in addition to this vast mail pay which he has read here is now paying a bounty on tonnage?

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator mean by her trade falling off? Even if now he is willing to admit that her commercial marine has increased, does he mean that her exports have fallen off, or her imports?

Mr. VEST. I mean that her commerce has fallen off?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly France by a consistent course of protection has built up and stimulated and established home industries to such an extent that where she was obliged formerly to import from abroad, she has the products at home. That is true. But France has not gone on and built up a mercantile marine, quadrupling it in the time given in these few years, without something for that marine to do, and these statistics show that it has plenty to do.

Mr. VEST. I have the official statement; I ask my colleague to read this statement, which comes from the bureau here, to show what the condition of French trade and commerce is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Ford winds up in these words:

> The bounties have succeeded in infusing life into neither ship-building nor ship navigation. France finds it cheaper to have her iron vessels built in Great Britain and a large share of her wooden ships in other countries. The lines of ships that were called into being through the liberal offers of the government are represented as being in a state of bankruptcy, and existing lines that participate in the bounties are either paying no dividends, or very small amounts. The exports of France, reflecting as they did the slight reaction which ensued in 1879, have since declined and are still declining in value, and the decrease can not be explained by a fall in the prices of commodities, but rather by an absolute decrease in the foreign commerce of the nation. In fact, it may be asserted that the bounty policy of France, intended to bridge over a temporary depression, has aggravated the situation, and has proved itself to be a source of mischief and not of cure.

> BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
> Department of State, April 7, 1886.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator got no figures? That is simply the report, the argument of a consul, without giving statistics, without referring to the figures, simply making his own conclusions. I do not deal with anything of that kind, and I fancy, as has been said to my right, it was a consul sent out for that very purpose; at any rate, he must be in sympathy with the purpose of the administration.

Mr. TELLER. I want to suggest to the Senator from Maine that

Mr. Ford's own statistics that he gives show that his conclusions are not correct.

Mr. HALE. Quite likely.

Mr. TELLER. If you look on page 10 of his report, it appears that the number and tonnage of French steam-vessels have increased very largely from 1873 up to 1884. The conclusions are not warranted by the facts he has himself stated in his report.

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, Senators are not satisfied with the report of one of our own officers, and I take it for granted—I do not know—like all the rest of them (for not many have been removed) he is in favor of a high protective tariff. If not, I ask his pardon; but if anybody could throw a missile and strike one of these officers that was not sending reports here in favor of a high protective tariff for Cleveland's administration, I would give a premium for him as a natural curiosity. It seemed to be their business in life to furnish arguments for the high protectionists in the United States. I do not know Mr. Ford, but if the Senators are not satisfied with his report I will read now from some other authority.

On page 113 of the report of the joint committee on shipping will be found a table showing that France has bound herself by contracts made in 1854, 1861, and in 1865, to pay to various steamship lines for mail transportation the annual sum of $4,677,778. Notwithstanding this, France found that she was fast dropping behind in the race for commercial supremacy, and so, in January, 1881, a law was enacted by the French Assembly giving large premiums upon both the construction and sailing of vessels under the French flag.

That is history; and if mail subsidies were a success, why was France driven to the law in regard to bounties? In 1850 the French tonnage amounted to 688,153 tons; in 1870 it had increased to 1,072,048 tons, but in the next decade up to 1880 it fell off to 919,298 tons, and that in spite of the enormous subsidies of over $6,000,000 a year paid to steamship lines by the French Government. In his work on "Our Merchant Marine"—I do not know whether it is considered good here or not—Mr. David A. Wells says:

> The results of the first year's experience of the French system, so far as reported, have not proved satisfactory. Bounties were granted for the encouragement of voyages between French ports, the French colonies, and countries out of Europe; but the returns for 1881 show a very marked decrease in the French tonnage engaged in her colonial trade as compared with 1880, when there were no bounties; while the French tonnage entries into French ports from foreign countries showed a decrease in 1881 as compared with 1880, with some marked gain in the same time in regard to clearances.
> But what is most noticeable is that the entries and clearances of foreign tonnage (which of course receives no bounty) into French ports during 1881 showed a very large increase as compared with 1880, and was apparently in no way affected by the new and discriminating privileges extended French shipping in order to enable it to successfully compete for foreign business.

And that is the result of increased mail pay or subsidies and bounties put together. But we are not without experience ourselves. We paid to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company from 1867 to 1877, $4,750,000, and $1,812,000 to the line between the United States and Brazil. Has that built up our merchant marine?

My point is that this increase of mail pay, or subsidy, to use the English expression, is not the remedy for the condition of the merchant marine of the United States. The disease is more deadly. It is like applying cuticura to a man whose lungs are diseased. When the vast fountains of life have been attacked, how long can we go on? The patient is in a desperate condition. It is hardly necessary to repeat what is the condition of the merchant marine of the United States, and yet Senators year after year appear here and clamor for the existence of these navigation laws and say to those of us who ask that something else may be tried and some other remedy administered, "Oh, you are in the interest of Great Britain; you are seeking to attack this high protective tariff system;" and then when they can not say anything more these Senators appear before their admiring constituency and say that the free-trade men of the United States or the revenue-tariff men are in the interest of Great Britain and seeking to strike down American labor! Why, sir, I received this morning and have upon my desk the following as a specimen of the high tariff literature disseminated through this country to the workingmen of America:

[Face.]

To the workingmen of America. A few facts from United States official reports, compiled by a workingman.

[Back.]

Fellow workmen are requested to watch closely the actions of their representatives in Congress. Any member of Congress voting for low-tariff measures is not "a workingman's friend," and should be shelved at coming elections.

I would like to see that "workingman." If he has not got a three-story silk hat on his head, and diamond shirt studs in his bosom, and a pair of fancy kid boots, and does not board at the Fifth Avenue Hotel and have his board paid by the manufacturers and ship-builders of the United States, I will forfeit one year's salary in Congress. "Workingman!" Horny-handed son of toil! Why does he not sign his name as an honest workingman? Is he ashamed of it? He is a hired subsidy tool of those interests that intend to keep upon us this badge of inferiority that says to American citizens, "You shall not take your money and buy your ships where you can buy ships, but for fear that you will affect this sacred white elephant of the high protective tariff, you shall not infringe upon the navigation laws, which are a portion of the protective system of the United States."

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I did not intend to speak upon this question; but the Senator from Missouri has indulged in such peculiar arguments, as I regard them, that being in favor of this amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill, I desire briefly to explain the reasons for my vote.

I regret exceedingly that the Senator from Missouri did not give us a clear definition of what is a subsidy. For instance, the Senator from Missouri introduced a bill here the other day guaranteeing the payment of $37,500,000 to a private company to enable that company to build a ship railway on foreign soil. That was a proposition to take the money of the people of the United States, to give that money to a private corporation, that corporation being engaged in a private enterprise. Now, Mr. President, I am not criticising that bill; I intend to vote for that bill; but why was it that that bill was introduced by a Senator who is so fierce and so vehement in his denunciation of what are called subsidies? Is it a consistent position for him to occupy that he introduced a bill for such a purpose and now earnestly opposes this amendment because this amendment is intended to establish a subsidy?

He gave as a reason in alluding to that ship-railway bill that there were certain enterprises of such a gigantic character that sometimes it became necessary for the Government of the United States to aid private capital in order to secure the accomplishment of such a great work. I beg to correct the honorable Senator's statement. Far greater enterprises than that proposed have been undertaken by private capitalists, and those great works have been accomplished without government aid or government assistance or government subsidies.

Such was the case with reference to the Suez Canal; such is the case now with reference to the Panama Canal; and therefore I do not admit that the reason which he gave why we should favor that subsidy is either very satisfactory or quite conclusive. But I take it that the real reason is that he approves of the policy which is declared in the bill which he proposes. I approve of that policy, and I think it is directly in the line of the policy declared in this amendment; and that is, that we shall have the aid of the Government to promote, encourage, develop, and build up our mercantile marine.

He says, but that is not the remedy; the remedy is free ships. Now, the Senator has no right to assume, as he did assume, that I as a friend of this measure am opposed to free ships, for such is not the case. I do not consider that there is any antagonism whatever between this amendment and free ships; and that is illustrated by the policy and the course of all the important governments to-day on the face of the earth.

France has free ships to-day, and yet France subsidizes steamship lines to the amount of $5,124,000 a year. Germany has free ships to-day, and yet Germany subsidizes steamship lines. Italy has free ships to-day, and yet Italy subsidizes steamship lines. England has free ships to-day in every sense of the word, and yet England subsidizes steamship lines.

Therefore I maintain that there is no incompatibility between the two systems; that a government and an individual may be in favor of free ships, and at the same time in favor of subsidizing steamship lines. Hence the criticism that I would make upon the position of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Missouri, living as they do in the far interior of our country, and of course being very well informed on maritime problems, better informed perhaps than those who live nearer the seacoast, is this: that you have been telling the American people and Congress for the last ten years, "Free ships is the remedy," but we have not got free ships, and we have not had free ships; and I ask you, can we continue to listen to that argument unless gentlemen are prepared to tell us when we are going to have free ships? Will they ask us to remain as we are and as we have been, for the next ten years, and occupy the same position that we have occupied for the last ten years; remain as a nation entirely bereft of all those advantages which we see are within our grasp; and are we to continue to remain satisfied in the future, as we have in the past, with very able speeches about free ships and free trade?

Compare the statistics of ten years ago with the exhibit that is made to-day. You will find that our trade relations with the Central and South American states, so far as progress, so far as increase, so far as development is concerned, are unchanged, scarcely disturbed, and on the other hand you will find that the trade relations of England, France, Germany, and Italy with those countries have vastly and incredibly increased; that to-day Italy, a nation that was born but yesterday, has closer trade relations with Brazil than the United States, at least so far as any advantages are concerned, and that to-day Italy has armored ships fit to be compared with the armored ships of England, has a navy compared with her population and resources equal to the navy of England, and has a maritime fleet that equals that of England when you consider the population and resources of the respective countries.

I saw last spring myself launched from one of her ship-yards a ship of 10,000 tons, a man-of-war, equipped, built, her armament constructed, everything the result of the industry and the skill of Italian mechanics; and, sir, that has been the ambition of every civilized country from the dawn of civilization to the time of the Romans and Carthagenians, and coming down to the time of the Italian republics and the time that Spain reached the zenith of her power; and to-day the great question and the great problem is one of maritime supremacy, because that represents (although the Senator from Kentucky wanted us to believe that there is no difference between a ship and an ox-wagon) the power, the ambition, the wealth, the prestige, the prosperity, and the civilization of a nation.

It is not, Mr. President, a question of free-trade or of protection; it is, in my judgment, a very narrow-minded view of this great question of whether a nation shall have a mercantile marine to attempt to apply to that problem the general theories and general propositions that apply to the domestic manufactures of any particular article. It is a question far above the other in dignity, in importance, and in its results.

For one, sir, I may say it is a strong sentiment residing in the breast of every American citizen, that he would prefer to see the American flag instead of the flag of other nations floating at the mastheads of the hundreds and thousands of steamships that enter the ports of the civilized world. I say, sir, it is a matter of which we ought to be justly proud, for if we are not we shall be in the history of the rivalry of nations the only people on the face of the earth that have not been proud of maritime power and maritime supremacy.

We have before us a practical proposition, a practical question; that is, to give Government aid to steamship lines in order to develop and increase our trade relations and commercial intercourse with certain nations, What do the opponents of this amendment offer instead of it? Nothing but general propositions; nothing but theories. There is nothing practical in what they offer. On the other hand what do its advocates suggest? We find that there is a strong feeling, particularly in my section of the country, being awakened and aroused to the great importance of this question. Our citizens feel and believe that the American people are entitled to that commerce; they believe that it belongs to the American people; and they also believe that there must be some extraordinary impediment which prevents them from reaching out and clutching those golden prizes almost within our reach.

Therefore it can not be an unimportant question; it can not be a question of free trade, and if the honorable Senator from Missouri permitted a certain expression to escape his lips that this was a political question, I would remind him, and I know that he can not be unaware of the fact, that the largest subsidies that have ever been granted in the history of this Government were granted under Democratic administrations.

That law which he has denounced, that the mails of the citizens of the United States should be carried in American ships alone, which has encountered his fierce opposition, was passed under a Democratic administration, was afterward approved and indorsed by a Democratic President, and under his administration contracts were made by which steamship lines were not only subsidized, but more than that, Mr. President, by which in order to make the subsidies available that Democratic administration indorsed the proposition that an enormous advance should be made to the contractors in order to enable them to build American ships and avail themselves of the subsidy; and here is what Mr. Polk said in reference to that law in his first message to Congress:

> Proper measures have been taken, in pursuance to the act of Congress of the 3d of March last, for the establishment of lines of mail steamers between this and foreign countries. The importance of this service commends itself strongly to favorable consideration.

Then for years an enormous subsidy was paid to various steamship lines. First, there was the Collins line; then there was the Sloo subsidy—subsidized steamships from New York to Havana, from Havana to New Orleans, and from New Orleans to Chagres. Then there was the Aspinwall subsidy from Panama to Astoria in Oregon. The Collins line received on an average every year $858,000, the Aspinwall line received $357,000 every year, and the Sloo line $284,000 annually.

That law remained upon the statute-books during nearly all the Democratic administrations, and even to-day, if I have not misread the statutes, there is a decided discrimination in favor of sending mails by American steamers. Therefore, Mr. President, I have not appreciated that argument by which a mere prejudice has been sought to be created. I prefer to listen to serious arguments. It is a question on which there may be an honest difference of opinion.

It is not a new question, it is not a question whether at any antecedent time there has been any corruption or jobbery in connection with the subject. That seemed with the Senator from Kentucky to be a very strong argument against this amendment. I do not suppose that the honorable Senator would have it understood that he intended to intimate that because a certain amount of money is appropriated by Congress to be disposed of by the present Postmaster-General under certain limitations and conditions, therefore there is to be any corruption or jobbery in the discharge of that public duty by the present Postmaster-General.

I have utterly failed to hear a perfectly serious argument in opposition to this amendment. What we do know is this, that in the rivalry of governments to secure trade, and particularly the trade with South America, there has been a policy agreed upon. Those governments are not disposed to throw away millions of dollars; those governments are economically and wisely administered; and yet we find that the four principal governments that have any seacoasts at all have agreed upon the policy that in order to establish trade with certain countries you must have certain regular and speedy communication. That is the system to-day.

Those who choose to adopt or to repudiate, to accept or to ignore that system, are at perfect liberty to do so; but I say there has been no explanation seriously attempted by those who have spoken against the amendment to explain to us why it is that the Government of France last year appropriated $5,124,000 to subsidize steamship lines; why it is that England appropriated an equally large amount; why it is that Italy, a country that is to-day struggling under the burdens of excessive taxation, appropriated $1,660,000 in order to sustain steamship lines so as to have speedy and certain communication with foreign countries.

I say that the argument of free ships does not touch the question, because all those Governments have free ships, and although they have free ships they find it necessary to subsidize steam lines. I say that the question of free-trade does not touch this question, because England is a free-trade country and England has been the parent of subsidies and her example has been imitated by other governments.

I say, Mr. President, that in my judgment the difference is because those governments have discovered and we have not discovered that trade to-day is operated upon certain conditions, and that you must have speed, regularity, and certainty by steam communication in order to secure the trade of a country. We are in some respects under more favorable conditions than other countries. We have the advantage of contiguity to the South American countries. They are our neighbors, anxious to trade with us, developing a marvelous commercial activity, having wonderful resources; countries which by reason of this very steam communication that they have had with other countries have developed an ambition to improve their condition, develop their great public works, and expand their commercial relations.

Mr. President, I did not intend to debate this question at length, but I desire to say that I shall always vote to develop and increase our trade with foreign nations. It adds to the aggregate wealth of the nation. It is a matter that I do not consider whether a particular section of our country is to be directly or immediately benefited by any such legislation. It is a matter in which I do not permit myself to consider whether a particular individual is to receive any benefit, for I know that the Government of the United States makes no contracts; it does not make a contract for carrying the mail on the Mississippi River or on the Kentucky River that some one is not already equipped and prepared to accept that contract to the exclusion of everybody else. I look upon this in a broader light, and for one I hope that the arguments which have been advanced against this amendment will be more serious arguments than I have heard addressed to the Senate in order to defeat its adoption.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the reason for the decay of American shipping in my judgment will be found in the fact that American capital can be more profitably employed in some other way than in building ships. I have heard much during the continuance of this argument of the advantages to result by the proposed appropriations, for which I intend to vote, to the restoration of the interests of American shipping; but I have listened in vain for some information as to the reason why the men of Maine and the men of Massachusetts do not now build ships if they want them. There is no reason why they should not build ships if they desire them. They have the yards and they have the forests and they have the mines and they have the skilled labor, and if ship-building was profitable, I venture to say that the capitalists of Maine and Massachusetts would build ships, and the reason why they have not done it is because they can make more money by building railroads, and by buying Western lands, and by lending on mortgage at 6 and 8 and 10 and 15 per cent. to Western borrowers.

I do not, therefore, Mr. President, feel that this appeal to a patriotic impulse to vote for a large appropriation out of the national Treasury for the purpose of restoring the decayed interests of American commerce has much weight. Very much the same argument applies to the carrying trade of this world. There has been a unanimity of lamentation upon both sides of this Chamber about the loss of the carrying trade by the United States, and we have been told of the disgrace and the shame that arises from the fact that the United States no longer has the carrying trade of the world. Mr. President, we did not lose the carrying trade of the world; we relinquished it. The reason why we have not the carrying trade of the world is because it is not profitable. Great Britain can afford to conduct the carrying trade of this world at a loss, as she does, because she has an insular position. There is not a point in Great Britain so remote from the seaboard that any product of her fields, that ny product of her factories or her mines can not by her railway system be placed in fourteen hours in the dock ready for shipment to any portion of the world. Great Britain has an enormous excess of manufacturing facilities. She wants an enormous amount of free raw material. Therefore, Great Britain and the other continental nations so situated can afford to do what they are now doing, and that is to carry on what may be called the transfer, the transportation business of the world by water at a loss. There is to-day a million tons of English shipping that can be bought for 50 per cent. of what it cost, if anybody wants to buy it. The best statisticians inform us that for the amount of capital employed in the carrying trade, Great Britain does not receive 1 per cent. per annum upon the capital invested.

Therefore the reason why the United States does not do the carrying business of the world is because she can do better. It does not sound reasonable or logical or sensible to rise here and declare that the reason we do not do the carrying trade of the world is because Congress does not vote subsidies for mail pay. Statistics show better; and whenever the carrying trade of the world can be conducted at a profit, the United States of America will have their share of it. But so long as American money can be more profitably employed in railroad transportation at home than it can in water transportation upon the deep, so long it will continue to be so employed, and the voting of $100,000 or $500,000 to one or more lines of steamships for service will not prevent it, and will not help it.

We have been told also that to the south of us there is a great commercial empire waiting for the invitation of American commerce. We have been appealed to to vote for this appropriation upon the ground that unless it is enacted by Congress that same balance of trade which the Senator from Maine depicted with so much vigor in his speech the other day would continue to be against us.

Mr. President, there is another reason why we have not got the trade of the South American republics, one that has not been mentioned here, one that deserves mention, because it is not becoming that Congress should be held up here and fustigated and castigated for unpatriotic frugality in failing to make the necessary appropriations, whereby we are unable to secure our share in the millions of South American commerce. The reason why we do not have South American commerce is because we do not attempt to sell them the things they want to buy. The reason why our merchants and our manufacturers find no market in South America is because the merchants and manufacturers of other countries can offer them a better article at a less price. There is no want of facility of communication; the testimony in the report of the commissioners shows that the means of communication are ample, but that in their dealings with American merchants and American manufacturers they have been flouted, they have been refused credit; they have not been offered the articles they wanted to buy, and when goods have been sold to them by sample they have proved to be entirely out of comparison with those samples both as to price and as to quality.

It will be interesting, inasmuch as this report of the commission has been so copiously quoted from, to hear a little what is said on this subject. In the first place, as to the facilities for the transaction of business, I read from page 31 of the general report dated the 1st of October, 1885, about the Central American trade. Says the commission:

As to Central America, on the west it is well served by the ships of the Pacific Mail.

Speaking about Venezuela they continue:

Our steamship connection with Venezuela is exceptionally favorable. It grows out of the fact that the large mercantile and commission firm in New York—have intimate relations with extensive houses in La Guayra, Caracas, Porto Cabello, and Maracaibo, and to do the business of these houses, as well as its own, it felt compelled to put on a semi-monthly line of steamers between New York and the ports we have mentioned. The headquarters of these houses are in Caracas, and the port of Maracaibo is connected with the line by a small light-draught steamer plying between it and the Dutch island of Curaçoa.

Giving their names—

The entire commission unite also in the following statement, which will be found on page 61 of Executive Document No. 50, Forty-ninth Congress, first session:

As to other modes of increasing our trade with Venezuela, we hear here only repetitions of the same complaints, or suggestions, which have met us elsewhere, and which have been set forth in our first report. Our merchants and manufacturers, if they desire to compete with those of Great Britain, France, and Germany, for the trade of Spanish and Portuguese America, should not rely on any self-complacent assertion of our national superiority in skill and taste, especially if supported by agents who, in their ignorance, obtuseness, or natural coarseness, parade their fancy of superiority over the natives or residents of the country they visit. But they should rely on the truly American commercial and manufacturing enterprise and sagacity, which exhibit themselves in ascertaining the wants and even prejudices of the customers they seek to win, in supplying such goods as they are disposed to buy, and in avoiding all attempts to pass off inferior or damaged wares upon people who, although not as advanced in general material progress as ourselves, are noted for their perspicacity and individual independence.

It would appear, then, from the examination which these commissioners were able to give upon the subject of South American trade and the best method of increasing our commerce in that direction, that they discovered that the chief difficulty rested upon an assertion, which was unfounded, of our national superiority; that we made a great many self-complacent assertions and complained of the ignorance and coarseness and obtuseness of the merchants in that locality; and that instead of relying upon American commercial and manufacturing enterprise and sagacity we displayed our skill in passing off damaged and inferior goods upon them, refusing to supply them with the materials that they wanted, denying them credit, and in various ways showing an indisposition to deal with them in those particulars and upon those relations which are alone possible as the factors of commercial relationship between nations.

The report of the commissioners is sustained by the evidence of a great many intelligent witnesses from which I will take but a very few extracts for the purpose of showing to the merchants and manufacturers of this country that it will not do for them to rely upon Congress for the purpose of building up South American trade; that primarily the fault is with them; and that before subsidies to steamship lines can afford any relief there must first be a disposition on the part of the manufacturing and commercial classes to send to those ports what the people want to buy, to treat them as if they were civilized beings, and to give them the same facilities that are afforded by the merchants of England, France, and Spain.

Mr. H. L. Boulton—I read now from page 69 of the report—who is an eminent merchant of that region, loeated at Caracas, speaking of the reason why the United States, nearer to Venezuela than Europe, does not get the business, says:

There would be no difficulty at all if they could produce as cheaply. Generally speaking, the American manufactured cotton goods and hardware are superior to the European article; very likely too good.

Mr. HALE. You have the wrong page.

Mr. INGALLS. No, I have not the wrong page. I propose to show from this statement that they do not want the best quality of goods. They are poor and unable to buy the best quality of goods; they want cheap goods; they want cotton cloths that are of an inferior quality; they complain that they should be from 1 to 2 inches narrower than our manufacturers make them, and that there ought to be 20 yards less in a piece than our manufacturers put them up, but that our manufacturers refuse to accede to that and persist in sending down to them a quality of goods which they can not afford to buy, and then complain of the want of traffic.

Q. The point is that our manufacturers do not adapt themselves to the tastes or the fashions, whatever it may be, of the consumers in Venezuela as well as the European?

A. Yes, sir; that in part, but it is not even that; it goes farther than that. The quality of American manufactures is superior to the general importation from Europe, as far as I understand, and consequently dearer.

Q. But they cost more?

A. Yes, of course.

Q. And if our dry goods manufacturers want this trade they must manufacture cheaper?

A. Not only that, but they must accommodate themselves to European ways.

Then he goes on to say what they are; that European merchants give them a credit of from six to nine months, and that the American merchants refuse to give them credit at all.

Q. Our people won't trust?

A. Well, they do not give such long credits as in Europe. Another thing is in manufacturing; as far as I understand, if you send for five hundred pieces of a certain class of goods to the United States, and you say those goods must weigh so much, and must be so many inches wide, if they have not got the looms they will say, "We can not do it." They do not put themselves out. If you send to Manchester for anything, they never say no; they make what you want.

Q. That is what we found elsewhere. Our people do not adapt themselves to the taste of the people?

A. They do not put themselves to the trouble of suiting the necessities of foreign trade in some things.

Mr. C. Röhl, upon page 77, was another witness. He is the consular agent of the United States stationed at that port. He says that most of the goods are obtained at that port from England and Germany.

What should our manufacturers do to obtain your trade here?

Asked the commission—

A. They should send out commercial travelers with samples, whose duty it would be to study the special requirements of the country; offer their goods and send their orders home.

* * * * * * *

The trade with the United States is gradually growing and increasing by its own efforts, and there is every reason to believe that it will further increase.

Q. Would increased steamship communication increase trade?

A. It seems to me that the steamship communication we have is quite sufficient. The owners of the Red "D" line do all in their power to meet every requirement. Their ships are first-rate vessels as regards speed, and in every other respect. Formerly we had two steamers a month; now we have three.

Mr. HALE. What country is that?

Mr. INGALLS. Venezuela.

Mr. HALE. That is the exceptional country?

Mr. INGALLS. Before I get through I shall show it is not an exceptional country, but even where the country is an exceptional one, where the means of transportation are ample, where there is no complaint, but, on the contrary, evidence that they have three steamships a month, even there traffic is practically destroyed, and simply because the merchants and manufacturers of the eastern seaboard refuse to adapt themselves to the requirements of the trade there.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me a question there?

Mr. INGALLS. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I used the word just now "exceptional" because it had been used by the Senator himself in reading a statement of the condition of our trade with Venezuela. It is exceptional. The commerce between the United States and Venezuela is increasing, and one reason why it is increasing is that we have there steamship communication more direct, ready, regular, and to be depended upon than in any other countries.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. Emerich Henry on page 83 says trade is not increasing. I do not know that he knows anything about other business, but his business is not much more since he started. He has been there for some time, how long he does not say.

Mr. ALLISON. The sewing-machine business is what he is engaged in.

Mr. INGALLS. On page 84 of the same report occurs the statement of another witness, E. Valiente, who is a citizen of the United States. He is asked what the Government could do to increase trade between the two countries, and he says:

Americans know very little and study very little and cater very little to our business. Our merchants in New York will not make prints, for example, of the width and size required, unless you give them an immense order. They won't touch it. Another thing is the packing. In the States they have the idea that we are fond of 1½-inch planks, and we have to pay duty on the gross weight. That alone kills three-fourths of the business, because you have also the interior freight to pay.

He says there should be a difference in the packing; generally speaking, in everything:

The American houses advertise here—

That is in Venezuela, where the opportunities of transportation are so great—but if you send an order they can't fill it; does not know the requirements of the custom-house, and the invoice is generally sent wrong, and therefore we have to deal with commission houses.

There is a singular uniformity in the testimony of all these witnesses in Venezuela as to the reasons why the trade with the United States is so defective and limited, all going to the general tenor that the fault is wholly with our merchants and manufacturers themselves and not with Congress, and not in the want of steamship facilities or mail accommodations.

As my colleague has the closing of the debate on this matter and the time is nearly approaching when the vote is to be taken, I do not desire to dwell further upon this subject. There is a great deal of exceedingly interesting detail in this testimony which I had marked to read on this occasion, both in the comments of the commission and in the testimony of the witnesses, all going to prove the same general statements I have made. My object in calling attention at this time to this feature of the report has been not to establish any argument whatever against the amendment offered by the Post-Office Committee, not to establish any ground whatever against the voting of necessary appropriations for mail pay for these steamship lines, but to show to the merchants and manufacturers of this country, and to call their attention to the fact in the most public way possible, that primarily the difficulties in our South American trade rest with them and not with Congress.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee? I offer the following amendment which I have written on a copy of the bill, and I will read it:

Strike out in lines 100 and 101 the words "American built and registered" and after the word "steamships" in line 101 insert "owned in whole or in part by citizens of the United States, whether built in America or in any foreign country;" so as to read:

For the transportation of foreign mails by steamships owned in whole or in part by citizens of the United States, whether built in America or in any foreign country.

And then at the end of the amendment, after line 114, to add:

And the ships so employed in such mail service shall be entitled to be registered under the laws of the United States, and shall be so registered and enrolled before the contract for carrying the mails on them shall become operative and effectual.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, for twenty years or more the American people have been calling upon Congress to take such action as would lead to the revival of our merchant marine; and through all those years discussions have gone on in every Congress which has assembled; but up to the present time we have not been able to agree upon any great measures of relief. In fact, the people as a whole have heretofore been divided in their opinions as to what action should be taken, and their representatives in the two Houses of Congress have been equally divided.

Two years ago, after an investigation by a joint committee of the two Houses, a small measure of relief was brought in and was enacted into a law. By it many of the small charges and burdens which were imposed upon American shipping were removed and much relief came to our merchant marine by the act of which I speak. But it was not such a measure of relief as would enable American shippers to enter successfully upon a contest with the great maritime powers of the world who for more than twenty-five years have been increasing their merchant marine, particularly England, Germany, France, and Italy, until today they are able to carry in round numbers three-quarters of the entire commerce of the world.

This contest was renewed again last year, and finally the two Houses of Congress, one Democratic and one Republican, united in appropriating $400,000 to be used for mail pay to American steamship lines to carry our mails to foreign countries. It was distinctly understood by Congress when that appropriation was made that it was made expressly for the purpose of aiding our merchant marine, of encouraging the building of American steamships, and encouraging our people to sail them.

After a long debate in the two Houses that appropriation was made, and the people of our country looked to it for relief and for aid in this matter. But the administration charged with the conduct of public affairs deliberately refused to expend that money at all. We were told in the public press at the time and in the reports which have been made that the law was so imperfect, so indefinite in its language, that the Postmaster-General could not carry it out; but the great leader of the Democratic party in this body in an attack upon the present amendment told the country that it was against the policy of this administration, that the President and the Postmaster-General had both protested against appropriations of this kind, for they were contrary to the principles which they desired to carry out in the conduct of public affairs.

We had been told before by the Executive himself that the office of President was an executive office; that it was one which had not to do with policies or plans of government, but that it was to execute the will of the people as expressed by the Congress of the United States. Now we are told by this leader that any appropriations for subsidizing American shipping is against the policy of the administration, and I presume, therefore, against the policy of the Democratic party. I discover, however, that the whole party is not united upon that policy even in this body. If it was united upon any policy, we should be glad to know what it is. If it be opposition to an increase of the American merchant marine, if it be against paying reasonable rates for carrying the foreign mails, we should be glad to know that. If they are absolutely united in favor of free ships and free trade, we should be glad to know that; for as a party of opposition it is somewhat difficult to know how to deal with a party in power controlling all the functions of this great Government when we find that party as represented in Congress united upon no single line of policy or upon no single proposition referring to government.

Therefore we must proceed to consider these questions outside of political lines, and upon lines of policy which have met with favor upon this side of the Chamber, and lines of policy which we believe here as Republicans, if carried into effect, will result in great good to all our people.

I do not care to go at length into the question of free ships or of a protective tariff, and had not those objects been brought in here by the two leaders of the party upon the other side who have opposed the amendment, had not these questions been brought forward here as the chief reason why we should not make this appropriation of $800,000 for the carrying of the foreign mails, I should not care to refer to them at all.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] seem to delight in telling the American people from this forum of the wretched condition of our Navy and of the more wretched condition of our merchant marine. They seem to delight to boast of the decline of both. But I have no desire to spread that record out here before the people. As an American citizen I am ashamed of both. As a representative in this body and in the other House of Congress I have been ever ready to vote liberal appropriations for the building up of a navy, and I have always voted for the most liberal appropriations which have been presented to this body for carrying the foreign mails, hoping thereby to improve and build up the American merchant marine.

I take no delight in talking of the decadence of our merchant marine. I find no delight in referring to the old hulls and useless ships of our Navy. For the last fifteen or twenty years the Republican party in control of this Government has sought frequently to add to our Navy by making appropriations for so doing, but almost without exception the effort has been met by the bitter, persistent, and undying opposition of the Democratic party. When a few years ago we did appropriate four or five million dollars to build some new cruisers and when they were finally started and nearly completed, the Democratic party coming into power struck down the builder and the interest which he represented by refusing, first, to receive a ship which had been accepted by the naval advisory board as having in every respect complied with the terms of the contract, and then when work had been stopped upon the other cruisers it finally completed its action by seizing the ships and the works of the contractor and thus destroying by one act one of the greatest ship-building yards in this country and a man who, starting in life as a poor mechanic, had achieved success equaled by no other American citizen in that line of industry.

But the record of this administration upon the building up of the Navy does not end there. We appropriated by the last Congress some three or four million dollars, I forget just how much, to go on with this good work which we had begun. We put it into the hands of this administration and called upon it to continue the work by devising plans for new and better ships and building them. A year and more has passed since that appropriation was made, but it has laid no new keel, it has started no new ships under it, and that money lies idle in the Treasury.

Mr. President, if the American Navy has declined since the war, the discredit lies not all at the door of the Republican party by any means; and if the American merchant marine has declined also, neither can it in my judgment be attributed to the policy of the Republican party in maintaining a protective tariff. Let us see. We are told by the Senators on the other side from Kentucky and Missouri that if we will repeal our obnoxious and barbarous navigation laws and admit foreign-built ships free to our registry and our flag we can then revive our merchant marine, and not otherwise. But every Senator knows that any American citizen having the money can purchase a ship wherever he likes, and can run it in all the commerce of the world. Our laws only deny him an American registry and the right to float the American flag. Our policy has been from the beginning of the Government down to the present time that the ship which carries the flag of our Government and which represents our Government should be of American build and of American material. But suppose we were to repeal these laws and admit ships free, would that materially aid us in the contest which we desire to wage with the great powers of Europe in securing back our proper proportion of the carrying trade of the world? I think not at all.

The Senator from Missouri will bear me out in the statement, for he was a member of the joint committee of the two Houses together with myself who made the investigation some two or three years ago, in saying that all the ship-masters of the country whom we called before us agreed substantially that the cost of building an iron steamship in an American ship-yard was not more than from 10 to 15 per cent. higher than the cost of building it upon the Clyde. When the Senator from Kentucky said the other day that we compelled a man who desired to sail an iron steamship to pay $300,000 for building it here in our yards when he could buy it for $200,000 abroad he went very wide of the truth in this respect, not intentionally undoubtedly but the difference which he gave is 50 per cent. The actual difference to-day is probably not more than 12 per cent.

That committee had before it the president of the Pacific Mail line, a line which runs both American-built steamers and foreign-built steamers, and the president told the committee that after having procured proposals from English ship-builders and American ship-builders he found the difference in cost against the American ship-builder was only 12½ per cent. There it remains to-day, and any man who knows anything about the sailing of vessels or the transportation of commerce knows very well that a difference of only 10 or 12 per cent. in the original cost of the plant will go but a very short way toward equalizing the differences between the English commercial marine and the American commercial marine in the cost of the movement of the ships.

The same investigation brought out the fact that owing to the high rate of wages paid to American seamen and American officers upon the line of steamships running from Philadelphia to England, in which there are four American steamships, the difference in the wages paid to the American seamen and the American officers was equal to 4 per. cent. upon the cost of the ships. How could we hope to succeed in so unequal a contest as this? I suppose, of course, that the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Missouri would answer, let as have free ships, manned by foreign officers and by foreign seamen at foreign rates of wages. While vessels of that kind might carry our produce and distribute it to the nations of the world, and might bring us back of the produce of the world what we wanted, it would not do very much toward restoring the American marine. No; if we were to have free ships it would go but a very little way toward equalizing the contest of which I have spoken.

The Senator from Kentucky tells us that we can not hope to sell our manufactured products abroad until we can produce them as cheaply as England, Germany, or France can produce them; and therefore we can not expect to have any of this trade. How does the Senator propose to reduce the cost of manufacturing in this country? We have the cheapest cotton in the world, because we produce it and furnish it to all the manufacturing countries of Europe. We have an abundance of cheap water-power, which furnishes the motive-power for our factories. Our local taxation is not greater than the taxation which bears upon the people of Europe. We have a higher rate of interest upon capital, we have a vastly higher rate of wages, and we can not upon the finer class of goods hope to compete with Europe in the trade of the world unless we have substantially the same rate of wages. But is the Senator from Kentucky or are any of the Senators upon that side of the Chamber willing to see the rate of labor in this country reduced to the rate of wages prevailing in Europe in order that we may thereby send a few more thousands of dollars' worth of manufactured goods to South America or to the Sandwich Islands or to the West India Islands or to China or Japan? I trust not, Mr. President. I hope the day is far distant when any such motive as that shall move the Congress of the United States to break down our protective-tariff laws.

What are the facts in regard to our manufacturing products in this country and our ability to furnish them in competition with the manufacturers of England and of Europe? We are able to manufacture and we are to-day manufacturing the cheaper and coarser kinds of cotton cloth as cheaply as they are made in Manchester or anywhere in Europe, notwithstanding we are paying a rate of wages to our operatives which is from 50 to 100 per cent. higher than is paid in those countries. We are producing and shipping these goods to nearly all portions of the globe in direct competition with England, Germany, and France. It is believed by the majority of the American people, certainly by those engaged in this industry, that if they had more rapid, regular, complete service with all South America and with the islands of the sea and with the Orient, we should be able in a very few years to double or quadruple the amount of coarse cotton goods shipped abroad.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. I only rose to say that the hour of 4 o'clock had arrived, and as the Senator from Kansas who has charge of the bill ought to be heard and there are other Senators who wish to be heard for a short time, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended until 5 o'clock to allow that to be done, and not to interrupt the Senator from New York in his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky that the time for debate be extended until 5 o'clock?

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say simply that under the circumstances, having opened the debate, I do not wish to have the time extended on my account. However, I understand that several other Senators wish to speak.

Mr. BECK. There are one or two Senators I know who desire to be heard, and I thought it would not take much time, and at 5 o'clock we might agree to take the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that proposition will be considered as agreed to. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. MILLER. In the manufacture of farm implements and tools of trade of all kinds we have excelled all other peoples, and to-day the agricultural implements of the United States are to be found upon the farms of every civilized country of the world. We produce better plows, better shovels, better farming implements of all kinds than any other country, and in spite of the uncertain and imperfect connection with many portions of the globe these implements of trade are finding their way throughout the world. In the manufacture of sewing-machines and similar articles we also lead all other peoples. I make the statement that in the classes of goods which I have mentioned and in many others also we are ready and prepared to compete with England, Germany, or France, provided we may have proper means of commercial intercourse with the nations which desire to buy these goods. We do not expect to be able to put our manufactured products onto the continent of Europe and to compete with the manufacturers there to any extent; but over the whole of South America, in the West India Islands, and in the Orient, if we can reach them and have proper means of commercial intercourse, we can, in my judgment, secure the bulk of the trade in all the countries I have mentioned. An examination of the reports of our Government in regard to our trade with many of the South American countries will, I think, bear me out in the assertion which I have made.

In addition to the manufactured articles of which I have spoken, which are so well adapted to trade with the various countries I have mentioned, we have a large surplus of farm products seeking a foreign market. These farm products to-day form the bulk of all our exportations not only in our trade with Europe but in our trade with South America. It will be found that the flour and other farm products are the chief articles which we export there.

Last year we imported from Brazil in round numbers $48,000,000 worth of products and we exported to Brazil seven and a quarter millions in value of our products. Still the Senator from Kentucky tells us we can not hope to have trade with that country or with the South American countries so long as we maintain our present tariff rates. Let us see. The reason given is that we can not hope to buy the products of Brazil because we impose a duty, he says, in round numbers of 46 per cent. upon the products of Brazil brought into this country. Of the $48,000,000 worth of products of Brazil brought into this country last year, $38,136,191 worth were upon the free-list, upon which not a dollar of duty was paid at all. They could be landed as cheaply in New York as in Liverpool, or Havre, or Bremen, or Hamburg, or any other port in the world. That $38,000,000 worth was composed chiefly of coffee, raw hides, raw rubber, tropical woods, and dye-stuffs. In fact nearly all the natural products of Brazil come in under our present tariff without any duty at all. But in spite of that we sold her less than $8,000,000 worth of products off the farm and from the loom and the machine-shop. About $30,000,000 of the importations from Brazil last year consisted of coffee; some $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 consisted of raw rubber; and between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000 of raw hides, all of which were free of duty. We sent back in return coarse cotton goods, farm implements, and flour, and other produce of our farms.

So you may take all the countries of South America, and you will find that in nearly every case we bought much more than we sold, and that nearly all we bought from South America came in without paying a single farthing of duty. How, then, would the Senator from Kentucky hope to increase that line of trade if we were to abolish all our duties? Would he have us go to Brazil for our wool? Would he have us go to Chili for our copper?

The commerce of the world is not barter in any true sense of the word at all. Now that the whole globe has been circled by discovery and by investigation until we know what are the products of every clime and every country, commerce consists in each country drawing from every other country what it most needs, what it most desires, and in selling back to that other country what it may need or what we may be able to persuade them to take. We do not grow coffee, and so we import $30,000,000 worth of coffee from Brazil. We do not produce raw rubber at all, and so we import nearly $4,000,000 worth of rubber from Brazil. We do not have the tropical woods and dyestuffs within the limits of the United States, and so we import them free from Brazil and from the Argentine Republic and from the whole of South America. Those countries desire certain manufactured goods, and they get them as they are brought to their shores by the vessels of other nations, having very few ships engaged in trade themselves.

Thus it is that the trade of the countries of which I am now speaking is controlled almost entirely by those nations which have the largest commercial marine. The control of the commerce of any of those countries is absolutely in the hands of those nations which control the means of commerce, and the means of commerce are not only the ships themselves, but they are the financial resources also of commerce, they are the banking houses which give credit to the merchants, they are the commercial houses and great shipping merchants which collect together the products of a country and send them out for trade and for commerce.

So it happens that to-day, when we are seeking for the commerce of South America, we find that Great Britain alone sends quite as many ships into those ports as all the other nations of the world combined, and thus it is that she is enabled to control the commerce of those countries. Wherever the English steamship goes out laden with the manufactures of Great Britain she finds at the end of her journey an English commission house ready to take the goods and find a market among the people of the country. She finds there a banking-house ready to give credit to the merchants, ready to extend credits upon bills of lading, and thus enable the business to be done. It is by all these means which she holds in her hands that she is enabled to control and does to-day so largely control the commerce of South and Central America.

It is not true, as stated by the Senator from Kentucky, that Great Britain controls the commerce of those countries because she buys more largely of them than any other nation does, for she does not. England takes from Central and South America of their raw products simply what she needs for her own manufacturing establishments and no more. If you go over the reports you will find that Great Britain in her commerce with those countries sells to Brazil much more than she buys from her. Her importations from Brazil last year were in round numbers £4,700,000 sterling; her exports were £6,471,000, selling back to Brazil much more than she bought from her.

This is strikingly illustrated in the condition of trade with the Argentine Republic, from which Great Britain bought last year £1,158,000 in value and sold to the Argentine Republic £5,810,000 in value, proving conclusively, what I have before stated, that the old rule of barter no longer holds good, each nation buying from every other nation what she needs and desires, and selling in return what that nation may need or desire. Where two nations are seeking for the same trade or are seeking to supply the same people with the same manufactured articles or the same products, that nation which has in her hands and controls the means of intercommunication, which holds the sinews of commerce, which are finance, will undoubtedly chiefly control the trade of that country.

That is what England is doing. Having made of herself the manufacturing center of the world, the workshop of the world, she sends out to the other nations of the world and collects any such raw materials as she may need for her manufacturing industries, and sailing her own ships and maintaining rapid mail communication with all the nations of the earth she is thus enabled to control the commerce of those nations to a larger extent than either the United States or any other nation.

I fail then to see how free trade or a large reduction of our present protective duties would enable us to compete with England, Germany, or France in manufactures of the finer and higher grades. We can not yet hope to do that, but in the particular lines of which I have spoken I have no doubt whatever of our ability to successfully compete, and that to-day we only need with all the outlying countries of which I have poken, regular, rapid, and frequent mail communication. Before commerce can do anything, before it can organize itself, there must be mail communication.

The Senator from Kentucky complained of the manufacturers of this country because they were not more vigilant in seeking a foreign market. It is not the manufacturer as a class who seeks the foreign market. The manufacturer of any one particular article can not afford to look for a distant market. That must be done by the middleman, by the shipping merchant, by the commission merchant, who, having his branch houses in all the great ports of those countries, shall gather up the orders for the goods which are desired, bringing them to our ports and there making his purchases and his collections and returning the goods which are wanted. It can be done in no other way. In our great cities they will not undertake the hazardous business of dealing in foreign markets unless they are sure of rapid communication by mail steamers.

It is for this purpose, and this purpose alone, that this amendment has been proposed and that it is sought to put it upon the bill. It is believed that if we can have weekly mails with the leading ports of South America we shall be able thereby to a very large extent to control the trade of those countries, for wherever a vessel goes laden with our products she is sure to seek a return freight and thereby to increase the trade. Take the one line running from New York and from Newport News to Brazil. The owners of that line have become commission merchants of necessity. They can not afford to run their vessels without freight, and so they are constantly seeking among American manufacturers, and among American farmers, for a consignment of goods to be sent to South America. They are constantly looking out for trade, and when they have secured it and have carried it to South America they must of necessity attempt to dispose of it. Thus it is that the steamship company itself in cases where regular trade has not been established becomes both the transporter and the commission merchant, and that has been particularly true of all the lines of steamships which have run from our shores to South America either upon the eastern or the western coast of that great continent. They have been compelled to do very largely the business of the middleman.

It is believed that if we can increase this communication, if we can have two or three lines of steamers running where we now have one, we shall in that proportion increase the shipments of our produce to those countries, and to a certain extent increase our importations also; or at least if we do not increase our importations that we shall bring these importations to our own ports in our own ships and under our own flag rather than that they shall come to us in foreign bottoms and under foreign flags.

The Senator from Missouri spoke of the case of an American shipmaster who, sailing from New York with a cargo to Chili, and having disposed of it, loaded his vessel with wool and copper, and returning to New York found that he could not dispose of it to advantage because of the duty. I know nothing about that especial case; but if there is any American shipmaster sailing out of our ports who is so ignorant of our laws, who knows so little of our system of protection to our own products that he did not know that there was a duty upon copper and a duty upon wool, in my judgment he was not a fit man to send out with a ship to engage in a foreign commerce.

If he had desired that cargo he should have shipped it to Liverpool, as the Senator tells us he finally went to that port. There would have been nothing strange or nothing irregular in that, for how is the great bulk of the commerce of the United States carried on with Brazil to-day? How is it that the $48,000,000 worth of the products of Brazil find their way into our ports to-day? Is it in American ships and under American flags? No; not 10 per cent. of it; but it comes to the port of New York in an English steamer, and when that English steamer unloads its cargo in New York it takes on board a cargo of wheat, or corn, or flour, and sails for Liverpool, because the shipmaster knows that that product can be disposed of there even if it has not been sold before he starts with it. Having unloaded his wheat in Liverpool, his ship again loads with the products of the loom and the machine-shop of England and goes back again to Brazil and there it loads with coffee, with rubber, with hides, which it brings to the United States.

That is the way the trade of England is carried on with Brazil, and if an American ship should engage in that triangular commerce I see no harm in it.

I do not understand or believe that the Senator from Missouri would desire to have the duty taken off copper or wool in order that we might go to Chili to get our supply of copper and wool there; neither do I suppose that his constituents in Missouri would care to have the duty taken off lead and zinc in order that we might go to some South American mine to get our lead and zinc, and that the lead and zinc mines in Missouri might be shut up and the miners turned out with nothing to do. If I remember the record of the Senator from Missouri upon that question, when the tariff bill was before this body three years since, he was found here advocating the highest rate of taxation with the highest tariff upon lead and zinc, because they were the products of Missouri. Put them on the free-list and perhaps you might settle the silver question, for a very large number of the silver mines of the West could not be carried on successfully to-day were it not for the profit arising from the lead found with the silver.

No, Mr. President, no country anywhere should buy natural raw products such as it can produce itself. The United States does not desire to go to Chili for copper, nor to any other country for lead or zinc or iron. Does Brazil, in order that she may have a better trade with Cuba, send to Cuba for her sugar or her coffee? That would be absurd. Brazil produces coffee for export, and she does not look for it anywhere else; neither should we in such a case. Whatever we can produce in this country we shall find it always to the best interests of all our people that it shall be produced here rather than that we shall go abroad for it. Shall we take the duty off wool in order that we may buy it in South Africa, or in Australia, or in Brazil, or in the Argentine Republic, or elsewhere, rather than that we shall grow it upon our great plains in the West, as we have been doing for the past twenty years? I think not. I do not believe that the American people are prepared for any such doctrine as that, and they are not yet ready to see any such principles carried into execution.

The Senator from Missouri objected to this proposition of voting $800,000 as a subsidy for the reason that there was no free competition, that it was confined to and would be expended only upon American-built vessels. He told us that Great Britain opened all her foreign-mail carrying to all flags; that her contracts were made with the lowest bidder without regard to the nationality of the bidder. I must take issue with the Senator upon that statement. He made the same statement here some two or three years ago and I controverted it at the time, and was able then to show that nearly all the moneys which England had ever paid out for the carrying of the mails to foreign countries had been paid to English ship-owners; that in one case she had made a contract with a German line of steamers and that the commotion raised in England and the opposition which her ship-owners and her people showed to it was such that the government rescinded it and gave it up. Nearly all of her contracts to-day for carrying mails are absolutely private contracts made by the board of admiralty without any public bidding, without any public notice whatever; and as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] tells me, one has just been made for twenty years.

England has governed herself wisely in this respect. She has sent out her consular agents all over the world and has discovered the wants and needs of every people. Where she has seen an opening for trade and commerce, there she has subsidized at once a steamship line to carry the mails and to carry her products, and when that was not sufficient she has not hesitated to bring on unjust and unrighteous wars with the weaker nations of the earth during the last thirty-five years for no other purpose whatever except that by so doing she might control the commerce and the trade of those countries. The wars of England for the past third of a century have not been wars for glory and supremacy over all lands, but they have been chiefly waged from the commercial standpoint and for the sole purpose of controlling the trade of the weaker nations. She has paid out vast sums of money for the transportation of her mails, and she has paid it almost exclusively to English subjects.

But let us see for a moment what another great nation is doing to-day, a nation which is striving to establish colonies and secure a portion of this valuable foreign trade. I read from a message of the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of State in relation to the mercantile marines of France, Germany, Great Britain, and Italy, sent here April 9, 1886, Executive Document No. 172. From the report of Consul Loening I read as follows:

The Imperial German Government has recently granted a subsidy to the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, of Bremen, for the establishment and maintenance of the following steamship lines:

One line for the trade with East Asia.

One line for the trade with Australia.

One branch (connecting) line from Trieste to Alexandria. For this the German Government pay the North German Lloyd Steamship Company 4,400,000 marks per year for a period of fifteen years.

Here is appended a translation of the contract entered into by the German chancellor with this steamship company. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a few of its provisions. It is very long and very full. It gives the government complete control over vessels for inspection, &c. I read from page 85:

ART. 10. The steamers to be employed in these lines must be built at German ship-yards, and as much as possible of German material. The plans of construction are subject to the approval of the imperial chancellor.

The vessels must have the highest classification given by the Germanic Lloyd.

The larger repairs to the steamers must also, as much as possible, be done on German ship-yards.

Thus you see that this contract provides that all these vessels under this subvention must be built in German ship-yards of German material as far as possible; that all their principal repairs must be made in German ship-yards. It is a very wise provision throughout, for the Government of Germany desires to encourage ship-building in order that she may be prepared with transports in case of war, and she desires to encourage her ship-builders in order that she may be able to build her own navy and thus protect herself. But it goes even further in this protection, and provides that—

The necessary supply of coals for the steamers to be employed in these lines, if received in German ports or in ports of call in the Netherlands or Belgium, according to article 1, must exclusively be German product. Changes are only allowed if the consent of the imperial chancellor is obtained.

There is a new subsidy just granted by Germany for encouraging this foreign trade in some of the countries to which we desire to extend ours. With her cheap labor in her manufactories in Germany, may it be possible for us to compete with her in the carrying trade with any of these countries if we leave our shipmasters without any protection, without any compensation whatever for the carrying of mails, giving them only the sea postage of 2 cents a letter, or even the sea and inland postage of 5 cents a letter? That is a contest which it would be worse than useless for our capitalists to undertake, and we can not hope to succeed in it.

I might go on and quote from this document. Of course the Senator from Kentucky and the other Senators will acknowledge its correctness, because it comes from the present administration, and the reports are almost entirely by the consular agents who have been sent out within the past year.

I do not care at any length to allude to the failure of the administration to carry out the law of the last Congress. That has been discussed in another body; it has been discussed by the public press; it has been discussed by the merchants and business men of our country. So far as I have been able to follow the discussion and the expressions of sentiment which have been made by our American shippers, it has been only one of condemnation. A year ago our mails to the Sandwich Islands, to China, and to Japan were carried with a good degree of regularity and speed under the American flag. We thought to improve and accelerate that transportation by appropriating a reasonable sum of money to pay for having it done; but what has been the result? The administration refused to expend a dollar of it; it sought in every way possible to evade it. It sent our mails under every foreign flag and in every kind of ship that it could induce to take them, and what has been the result? Talk with any of the leading shippers of New York city, Baltimore, or New Orleans, or of any of our ports, and you will find that it has been greatly to the detriment of our business.

Our mails have been irregular, bills of lading sent out with shipments have reached their destination sometimes a week after the cargo had arrived, and the consignee could not avail himself of the shipment, could not pass it through the custom-house, could not put it upon the market because he lacked the invoice and the bill of lading. Our foreign trade and commerce has been greatly disorganized by the refusal of the administration to carry out the plain enactment of last year. Now we are told that we must not make this appropriation, that we must not make any appropriation of this kind because it will greatly embarrass the administration, and because the administration is opposed to this whole policy.

I send to the desk to have read a short passage which will show something as to how American mails have been treated during the past year.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, April 28.

The manner in which the United States mails are treated by English tramp-steamers, to which they are committed by Postmaster-General Vilas, is related in a recent number of the Daily News, an English paper published in Rio de Janeiro, which has just been received here. It appears that the Post-Office Department intrusted fifty-two bags of mail to an English tramp-steamer named Marahneuse, and paid the captain of that steamer for the transportation of this mail to Rio de Janeiro. When the captain got to Pernambuco, which is only little more than half-way, he disposed of the cargo of flour that he was carrying on speculation, and, having to go no further down the coast, he dumped the United States mail that he had contracted to carry to Rio upon the pier at Pernambuco, filled up his vessel with coffee, and started for England. When the steamer Finance, of the United States and Brazilian Mail Company, arrived in Pernambuco it found this large accumulation of mail that had been dropped there by the Marahneuse. The American steamer was under no obligation to touch it, as the Post-Office Department had simply deprived the company sailing under the American flag of the transportation of this mail in order to give it to an English tramp; but the captain, as a matter of patriotism, took the mail on board, carried it to Rio, and not only did not receive one dollar's compensation for its transportation, but was fined by the Brazilian Government for not getting this mail there on time. An explanation was made, but the Brazilian authorities would not believe that the Government of the United States, having its own steamers sailing in that direction, would intrust its mail to irresponsible tramps, to be thrown overboard whenever they got tired of it.

Mr. MILLER. That is only one illustration out of many which I might present here. It admits of no excuse, no palliation, in my judgment. The appropriation made by Congress was absolute, and the debates in this body showed for what it was intended and the spirit in which it was made. It was understood by all that it was made in order that an incentive might be given to the running of American steamship lines to all the ports of which I have been speaking. The amendment which is now proposed increases the amout of money which is to be expended, and it attempts to make the law so plain and direct that even this administration can not fail to understand it and will have no possible excuse for violating it or neglecting to carry it out. But the simple remark of the Senator from Kentucky in my judgment gives us the key to the whole situation. For twenty years or more a few of the leaders of the Democratic party have persistently, "in season and out of season," labored against subsidies or liberal mail pay for the carrying of the mails. At last finding that a majority of Congress was against them, they seem to have been able to outwit the representatives of the people in their legislative capacity and to secure from the present administration a nullification of a law which they could not prevent the representatives of the people from passing.

I trust, Mr. President, that this proposition will carry and that it will be enacted in such plain and unmistakable terms that no one who is charged with the administration of public affairs will venture to violate it or evade it. I believe that if it is carried out faithfully and honestly, it will more than quadruple our exports to all the South American countries, to the leading islands of the West Indies, and to the Orient. I wish that the appropriation were larger and more specific in its terms. I believe it to be one of the most important appropriations proposed for the action of this body, and believing it to be so, I have supported it, and I shall hope to see it succeed.

Mr. COLQUITT. Mr. President, I shall abbreviate the remarks I intended to have made at an earlier stage of the debate. I recognize what is due the Senator from Kansas, that having charge of the bill he should have an ample opportunity to close the debate.

I am opposed to this amendment. I am opposed to it on general principles and for specific considerations. I shall not discuss them fully but present in as concise a way as I can the reasons which influence my own judgment.

Subsidies by the Government are in most instances invidious. The people are jealous of them. The inquiry is promptly made after every appeal for special favor, what special benefit will result to the public?

This we know, that the cost is a sure thing. We want to see, and very distinctly, what reciprocity is to follow the cost. Individuals have not, as a general thing, the courage necessary to bring them to Congress in the character of mendicants.

It takes rich corporations to enact this rôle of brazen importunity. The sets of men who band themselves together professing to be about to do great things for the country in making themselves rich can come here and demand protection and subsidies. The individual or the modest corporation must live without the bounty of the Government, and be content with paying tribute to others.

In the case before us there is a specious offer of reciprocal good resulting to the people from the gift of this large amount to some fortunate company of ship-owners. I say a gift, because it is not pretended that this sum is necessary to insure a safe and expeditious transmission of the mails. In my judgment, Mr. President, the absolute certainty of a fair return for this gratuity does not justify Congress in a step of such doubtful propriety and policy. This is only a case of favoritism and protection, and its disguise is too transparent to deceive any one. It is wrong in theory, wrong in effect. Wrong, because we are proceeding without unquestioned constitutional authority; wrong, because by this measure and cases like it we are educating our people to a dependence upon the help of the Government, instead of dependence on self-help. It is wrong, because it is in sympathy with monopoly, and discourages a healthy competition, which always evokes the best powers of practical intellect. Give favor and encouragement to such propositions as this, and you inevitably arouse a cupidity that is never satisfied, and you invite numberless appeals for just such subsidies. It is charged that, as a people, we are possessed of exaggerated self-esteem, and that we are given to boasting; but it can not be denied that we have an energy and enterprise which are invincible. We started the first steamboat without subsidy; we sent across the Atlantic, in spite of Doctor Lardner, and without subsidy, the very first steamship that ever accomplished the voyage.

We had at one time the second greatest commercial marine that was afloat, and acquired it without subsidy. We have just triumphed over the mistress of the seas by the victory of the Puritan; and so in every department of life and business we do what we are determined to do and nothing can stop us. But without a thought of what has been accomplished we are here to-day prescribing against this natural and sturdy self-reliance. We are preparing cradles and crutches in this Chamber for enterprise and business dash. Instead of teaching lessons of dauntless resolve and execution, we are training every business venture to reach out to the Government supplicating hands for help. A sound and expanding industry never needs a forcing, hot-bed process. If it has intrinsic virtue and vigor, it will grow in spite of discouragements; and if it has not, it will perish in spite of nursing.

I object to this amendment because the reasons assigned in support of it are so utterly unsatisfactory. With great emphasis Senators speak of the immense value of South and Central American trade and the contemptible share of it which falls to our lot. We get about one-seventh part of this trade which Great Britain has secured; she has more than seven times the postal communication with these people than we afford to our merchants, and, therefore, it is argued the difference in trade is to be accounted for by mail facilities. There never was a more palpable non sequitur. It is to my mind a clear case of mistaking an effect for a cause. How can correspondence and mail facilities create trade? These are certainly helps—necessary consequences and concomitants—but the sequence is, trade first and then your postal facilities. Well has it been remarked by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that there never was a valuable load that needed transportation that some vehicle was not ready to move it.

We want trade with South and Central America predicated upon the value and price of what we have to sell and what they have to give in exchange. Let me pause to qualify that assurance by saying, unless in future cases we exemplify the curious economy and statesmanship that has left us an insignificant part of the carrying trade to our shore; and here it is pertinent to ask, why does our trade with these states make so sorry a show by the side of the figures presented by far distant countries? Right at our doors, these people should have for us the partiality of friends and neighbors, and our propinquity should distance all competition in the trade with them.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the conclusion is inevitable that our present system of restriction by high tariffs is wofully defective or we have not given it a fair trial. I suspect the fair trial has been had. No Senator here raises his voice for a higher tariff than the one that now afflicts us. It seems we are to be left to repose quietly upon the present liberal average rate of 46 per cent., and then wait developments. The developments are here, and here with a vengeance; that system that was to make our charity begin and stay at home, that painted in such rosy colors the omniverous capacity of our home market, and its voracity as well; that taught us to imitate the enlightened Chinese in secluding ourselves; that persuaded us to yield nothing to the catholic spirit of commerce, but to get all we can and keep it if we could, and above all, the competence it was to give to the dear workingman, lifting him up, insuring unrestricted comfort, and making him the dominating factor in our industrial enterprises.

Where are the evidences of the boasted power of this American system, so called? What is it doing for us to-day? Under its blight our carrying trade has diminished to such proportions as should startle the country. But for our conscious vitality we could but take the pitiable condition of that trade as a portent of speedy decadence. We feel, however, it is only malpractice, and not the natural decay of the subject that alarms us. Great as this interest is, and as necessary to our power as a people, we can bear its loss better than we can the loss of good-will and fraternity between our laboring people and the men who employ them. The old-time cordiality between these classes must be restored or we can predict nothing good of our society. If our laboring fellow-citizens really have no grievances their minds should be disabused. If they have, the duty of Government is to rectify the wrong, where Government is at fault, and public opinion must bring its resistless power to act on the injustice and oppression which are alleged.

It is a pity, Mr. President, that impartial justice must render a decree in so many cases against the misuse and abuse of the power and wealth which have been conferred by discriminating legislation. To listen to the debates in Congress and the endless dissertations of the press, one is led to believe that all the good that is looked for from our exacting tariff is that the wages of the poor workingman should be enhanced. In ten thousand phases of speech and declamation we are told that American labor must be protected, that there is a dignity in labor we are bound to respect. In giving practical effect to this high-sounding profession we levy from everybody, the unprotected majority as well as the favored minority, countless millions every decade. All this eloquence, all this disinterested legislation so assiduously fostered by the rich manufacturer, does not prevent the importation of any man from Europe who can bring his arms and legs with him to help the bosses to regulate the scale of wages.

All this cant about labor, its rights and dignity, does not save this land of liberty, of free soil and cheap soil, from witnessing at this moment such scenes of tumult and such rabid demonstrations of rage on the part of the laboring classes as are enough to blanch the cheek and make the heart quail. As far as I know the capitalists who are complained against are doing very little to appease the bad spirit that is abroad. They close their royal establishments, retire to their palaces, and hugging our tariff of 25 and 100 per cent. to their bosoms, they challenge the grateful acknowledgments of their working people, turned adrift, for what they have done in behalf of a tariff for the protection of American industry and the poor laborer. For one, I regard these troubles as something more serious than an effervescence. They betoken strife and convulsion, and it behooves us to see to it if Government is in the wrong that we repair the wrong.

No man can convince the public mind that the widespread discontents of our people are merely sporadic, and that they are the result of natural causes. With no military proscription to rob families of their props, with lands held in fee-simple at one-sixth the cost of rents in other lands, and with unmatched energy and intelligence giving momentum to our industry, it is a marvel that the country is environed with such a multitue of troubles and perplexities.

Mr. President, we must retrace our steps and reform our measures. The insane idea of constructing a barrier all around our land to prevent intercourse with foreign powers must cease. The figment of the brain called home market and home consumption must be supplanted by the common sense of selling at the highest price and buying at the lowest. When you open our market to the world and put American labor on its mettle we will soon see that we will hold our own against all comers, and give the world many times again, as we have many times in the past, some valuable lessons in industrial science. A steady and equable income of fair profits to our mines and factories will keep the great masses of our laboring people quiet and hopeful, and give such returns to capital as shall be remunerative and at the same time free from all invidious quality.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator from Georgia that the time has arrived at which it was agreed that the vote should be taken.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator from Georgia may be permitted to proceed to the conclusion of his remarks, and to ask in addition—knowing as I do that there are at least two Senators who desire briefly to be heard, I not being one of them, however, upon this question—hence I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the general debate upon the bill may continue till 2 or 3 o'clock to-morrow, after which the Senator from Kansas shall have from 3 to 4 within which to conclude the debate upon the bill, when we shall come to a vote upon the amendments and the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the debate will be concluded to-night. ["Oh, no!"] I think we ought to get to a conclusion, if we are going to do any business besides pass appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not object to the arrangement proposed.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Illinois will allow me to suggest to him that it will be some time after 5 when the Senator from Georgia concludes his remarks, and the Senator from Kansas is to close the debate.

Mr. COLQUITT. I shall not occupy over ten minutes longer.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Kansas in charge of the bill [Mr. PLUMB] should certainly have some time, after these days of discussion, within which to conclude the debate, and I should regret for one to have him forced to begin the conclusion of the debate at 5 or half past 5 o'clock in the evening.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no disposition to take any course that will result in depriving the Senator from Kansas of the power of controlling the debate. I understood from the Senator that he did not expect to make any further remarks; and that being the case, it seems to me that we ought to conclude this bill to-night. I, of course, do not wish to oppose the desire of the Senator in the premises; but there are other measures which have been waiting on this bill many days, when the discussion upon it was not expected to take more than one or two days, and I am very anxious that this bill should be concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand that the Senator from Illinois objects.

Mr. CULLOM. I will only say that if the Senate by a unanimous consent will allow the bill which was laid aside for the purpose of considering this bill to be taken up and considered from day to day immediately after the morning business until it is concluded, I will not make any objection now; but the experience we have had in reference to the consideration of general legislation here, considering it an hour or two to-day and then going on with something else, is throwing away time; and I should like for one to get at a bill that has something in it and stick to it until we get through.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, with this qualification: The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE], whose health compels him to leave the city within a very few days, desires to occupy the attention of the Senate during the morning hour to-morrow after the routine business with the bills of the Committee on Claims. After to-morrow I have no objection whatever to the course proposed by the Senator from Illinois; but the Senator from New Hampshire being absent, and he having notified me of his object, it is proper that I should make the suggestion to the Senator from Illinois in connection with what he has stated.

Mr. CULLOM. Do I understand, then, that the proposition is to finish this bill to-morrow, and allow the Senator from New Hampshire to have the morning hour besides in which to get rid of his measures? I shall be very glad if we can do both.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no doubt we can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the proposition to the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asks unanimous consent of the Senate that this bill be taken up at 2 o'clock to-morrow as the unfinished business and be continued until 3, when the general debate shall terminate and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] shall have the opportunity to close it within the next hour, and that then the vote shall be taken without further debate.

Several SENATORS. At 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At 4 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. On the whole bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In connection with that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] asks unanimous consent of the Senate that after that what is called the interstate-commerce bill shall be taken up and be continued.

Mr. CULLOM. Immediately after the morning business on the following day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this proposition? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. COLQUITT. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire for information whether the unanimous consent thus agreed to covers the whole Post-Office appropriation bill, or merely the pending provision?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the whole debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill to be included, as this is the last amendment. The whole debate is to close at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COLQUITT. But, Mr. President, I distrust the reception which the majority of this body will give my prescription for our troubles. I rather incline to the belief that they will go on piling up a superfluous production of home manufacture and then making the vain attempt to force this vast mass down the throats of our home consumers. We have offered us, however, a nostrum in this subsidy of $800,000. By this it is expected to accomplish the work of relief. The amount of trade which this subsidy is expected to create must be of very modest proportions. Eight hundred thousand dollars, it is true, should pay for a great deal of postage, and would if in the run of the luck of the experiment the postage should offer. We have heard of the Battle of the Books, but here to-day we are inaugurating the battle of the letters. England, so Senators allege, has secured almost a monopoly of South American trade because of her prodigal expenditure in subsidizing her mail ships.

We are advised to make this appropriation because the leading powers in Europe have expended great sums in fostering a splendid mail service with the States whose trade it is so desirable to secure. It seems to be in the opinion of Senators a question of expenditure, a sharp contest in which the potency of subsidy is invoked. The more lavish the appropriations the greater the trade, seems to be about the proper statement of the case. What, sir, is to be the inevitable result of the policy which this sort of legislation is to fasten on us? This seemingly harmless sum of $800,000 is to be the excuse and precedent for the granting of numberless millions. If it is true, as has been claimed, that because of England's great expenditure, because France and Germany have spared no expense for mail ships, that therefore they have superseded us in the markets we are so anxious to secure, what is the task we have set for ourselves in this mighty rivalry?

If money is to champion our ambition in this race, what a field are we contesting. England, Germany, and France, stimulated by rivalry and jealousy, would go on increasing their subsidies furnished out of resources almost fabulous. If we attempted to overmatch the outlay of these great powers their obvious resort would be to larger and still larger subsidies, and in this desperate conflict of interest and ambition unimagined millions would be lavished upon an enterprise which at last is one of individual concern and by which, let matters go as they might for our Government, capitalists and corporations would be enriched. If we begin this conflict, national pride may take us a long ways beyond the bounds of prudence and the dictates of sterling business sense, and we shall find at last, after the loss of immense treasure, that we began wrong; that our diagnosis of our ailment was all at fault, and the last state of the patient was worse than the first.

But, sir, are we sure of the precedent so confidently relied on by Senators in their advocacy of the example of England? The principle and policy involved in her pursuit of commercial advantage by the means proposed in the amendment before us have been powerfully combated by some of England's ablest authorities. I will ask the Senate to hear the opinion of one of these in an address to the president of the board of trade:

> It is not conceivable that the board of trade can be accessory to the proceedings of the post-office, admiralty, and treasury in regard to this monstrous modern parasitical system of ocean steam contracts, under shelter of which the regions of the seas are being successively parceled out and handed over to the scepters of intriguing companies. This system of endowing squadrons of mercantile steamers with enormous bounties or subsidies, under the dodge of conveying mails, vests in the steamers so endowed a virtual monopoly of the conveyance of all goods and passengers requiring dispatch to destinations within the circle of their operations; and while these subsidized steamers obtain exorbitant rates of freight for the limited quantity of goods and passengers which they carry. The public not only have to submit to their extortionate freights, but even at those high rates are deprived of adequate accommodation, because independent ship-owners are deterred in the face of the endowed monopoly from boldly entering the field and providing expanded means of transit. In short, these monopolies, supported by public bounties, are at variance with all sound commercial principles. It is the custom, whenever anything of this kind is mentioned as having an injurious effect on any branch of British industry, to treat such complaints with contempt and to invoke for consolation the cuckoo song of "British enterprise," "British science," "British genius," "British energy." That British enterprise, science, genius, and energy are indeed giants I entirely admit; and with a fair field and no favor, such as they enjoy in other branches of industry, and such as I hope you will obtain for them on the ocean, they are prepared to develop results in ocean steaming, both in quantity and quality, so much in advance of what the bulk of the public have a conception of as would be astounding; but it is possible for even giants to be made powerless if they whose duty it is to protect them permit them to be circumvented. I implore you, as president of the board of trade, to interpose and to insist that no subterfuge about the conveyance of letters shall any longer be permitted to deprive the community of the benefits which the art of steam navigation in its advancing state is, if unfettered, prepared to bestow.
> I am aware that there is an impression somewhat prevalent that the modern contract system of ocean steamers is necessary toward keeping up existing communications, and also that the public are indebted to the system for the creation of the communication.
> This I contend is an entire mistake, but vigorous private enterprise has been hors de combat for some time past, owing to the heavy blow and great discouragement which the wanton introduction of the contract system inflicted upon it. Although in unendowed services there have been immense improvements in steam navigation of late years, those transatlantic companies which have the chancellor of the exchequer at their back have scorned the adoption of any of them.

Mr. President, if objections which have already been adduced in the progress of this debate to this amendment needed support it would seem that they are powerfully re-enforced by this impressive statement.

In concluding what I have to say upon the question before us I would remark that it may prove fortunate that in this unexpected way admissions have been made of the business condition of this Union which call so loudly for grave consideration. The discussion of these admitted facts has come up collaterally, and yet our consideration of them was natural, and we might say inevitable. The reasons given by Senators for the subsidy asked for by implication at least supposed a state of things as regards our external trade which is lamentable indeed, and is to my mind the necessary outgrowth of our revenue system. It is useless for us to attempt by such expedients as the one we are now considering to redress the blunders we are committing by that system. These are only palliatives, if they may be called such, and can effect no radical or permanent redress of our troubles. There is but one way that mortals have ever yet thought of by which a living can be made. Work and economy is that way. Governments are not exempt from the inexorable decree any more than individuals. One thing is sure, and after a while the friends of subsidy and taxation will learn it perhaps, and that lesson is, that no people ever yet got rich and laid the foundations of a solid prosperity by robbing one another. Another lesson, too, will follow, and that is, that sixty million of people have just so much capacity of consumption, and all the home markets that the protectionist can give them can not enlarge that capacity. Localizing trade, shifting purchasers from one point to another in our country do not increase the capacity to consume or the capacity to purchase. Independence and domestic comfort come to all, not born with the gold spoon in their mouths, by drops of sweat and many of them. Subsidy, partiality, and unjust shifting of burdens do not enrich men. They may enervate and debauch the true spirit of manhood, but they never yet achieved any solid or lasting good. Resist it as we may, the impregnable Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue, an honest and economical administration of the Government, and a fair chance, and that only, for every bread-winner in the land, will triumph at last, and assert itself as the only true "American system."

These considerations are conclusive with me, and I think they should be especially persuasive with the members of this body on this side of the House who have been placed in power upon platforms, speeches, and declarations at the polls of what they meant to procure by a Democratic administration, the object being retrenchment and reform.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to allow me to offer formally an amendment that I suggested to-day and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama will be printed if there be no objection.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, having occupied so much time heretofore, I do not propose to debate this question any further; but a statement was made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] on Friday last that I am advised is incorrect, and I desire, if the Senate will allow me, to endeavor to correct it. The Senator said:

> But there are two sides to that question. It is a grave question whether even at present, with the small facilities we have with certain American states, the mails could not be better carried in our ships than in what are called the "English tramps." I have just had an instance presented to me giving an account of one of these experiments of the Postmaster-General, as taken from an English paper published in Rio Janeiro. This is the story of a course pursued by the Postmaster-General in putting our mail into foreign vessels instead of taking our own lines or encouraging them. It seems that the Post-Office Department intrusted an English ship about departing for Rio Janeiro with fifty-two bags of mail which were put on board the English ship and refused to the American line. The English shipmaster had no responsibility to this Government after he had taken the mails, and when he reached Pernambuco, hundreds and hundreds of miles inside of his destination and of the destination of those fifty-two mail bags, he was able to sell his cargo there. Forthwith he dumped the United States mails on to the wharf at Pernambuco, filled up his ship with what freight he could get and sailed away for England, leaving the United States mail there upon the wharf.
> What happened further? In a few days along came a ship of the American line which was sought to be encouraged and stimulated and helped by the act of last year, which Mr. Vilas disregarded, and although there was no obligation whatever, still with that feeling of loyalty and patriotism which the Senator from Kentucky says has nothing to do with this question, the captain of that steamship took the mail voluntarily on his ship and made his way to the port of Rio Janeiro, his destination as well as the destination of this large mail which the Post-Office Department had intrusted to the English tramp ship; and when he got there, actually because the mail was behind not only did he receive nothing from this Government, but he was fined by the Brazilian Government because the mails were late. When he undertook to expostulate and show the situation the Brazilian officials refused to believe that the American Government had adopted any such policy or had committed its mails to an outside ship in that way, when there was an American line running to the very port.

I thought that a very remarkable statement, and I inquired into it with some care this morning. The statement I have is from a very well-informed officer in the Post-Office Department, as follows:

> The mail referred to by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was conveyed by the Red Cross line of mail steamers, making regular trips from New York to Pernambuco. That line has been employed regularly by the Post-Office Department for the past ten years.

I have the advertisement of the Postmaster-General giving the list of steamers that he used. The Red Cross line from Para and Pernambuco, with mails for Brazil and for the Argentine Republic, Uruguay, and Paraguay, by way of Brazil, is one of the regular lines that has been used for ten years past and is being used now. The statement proceeds:

> And the mails destined for Rio Janeiro have been sent regularly by this line to Pernambuco to connect with Brazilian steamers from there to the port of destination. The Red Cross and United States Brazilian line of steamers sail about fifteen days apart.
> If the Senator from Maine had been informed as to the international Postal Union treaty, he would know that a steamer can not dump the mail on the wharf anywhere, but that the mail must be delivered to the office of exchange to which the mail is addressed. When foreign mails are exchanged between countries of the Postal Union, Brazil being one of them, they are delivered at an office of exchange of the country of destination. It becomes domestic mail of that country, and the country of origin is relieved of all control of it whatever. The Post-Office Department never has refused to give the mail to an American line.

In the international postal treaties made at Paris, Lisbon, and Berne, Brazil undertook whenever mail was delivered at any of her ports from any of the countries of the Postal Union to see to it that that mail was properly forwarded. Therefore it is safe to say that the information received by the Senator from Maine from the English papers or any other papers published in Rio de Janeiro in regard to the action taken by our Post-Office Department was as misleading as many of the other things that we find in the newspapers published nearer home.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator through with that part of his remarks?

Mr. BECK. I am through with that part.

Mr. HALE. I wish to repeat here what I said the other day——

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senator from Maine, if he will allow me, that before I yield the floor I wish to say something on another point.

Mr. HALE. I only asked the Senator if he was through with that part.

Mr. BECK. I am.

Mr. HALE. I said the other day in giving this remarkable story:

> This is the story of the course pursued by the Postmaster-General in putting our mail into foreign vessels instead of taking our own lines or encouraging them.

And I said it was "taken from an English paper published in Rio de Janeiro." I was careful to give my authority. The account which is repeated in the correspondence of one of the New York papers is taken from the Daily News, an English paper published in Rio de Janeiro.

I have listened carefully to what the Senator from Kentucky has just said and what he has read in the communication made up at the Post-Office Department. Whether or not all that he has said and all that he has read may not be compatible with the fact that they are referring there to another incident I do not know. I do know, however, that the Postmaster-General intrusts American mails to foreign ships. That he does not deny, and all that is stated in this English newspaper, whether it be true or not, may be true, and the general assertions made by the Senator from Kentucky, or quoted or read by him, may also be true. I gave my authority the other day; it is copied in detail into one of the great New York papers, and that was my responsibility.

Mr. BECK. I did not rise to find fault with the Senator from Maine for making the statement, but to assure the Senator that this was a regular mail vessel, and it was not a tramp, that purported to go to Rio; it was a regular line of vessels used for the purpose of transporting the mail as a proper means of conveyance, going to Pernambuco, and there taken up by Brazil under treaty, and had been so used for ten years. Pernambuco was the regular port of landing where these ships delivered their mails in accordance with the postal-union treaty, of which Brazil was a part, she being a country that had her own steamers to take the mails up and carry them; and if any fault was to be found it was not to be found with the Government of the United States in its action with regard to the forwarding of the mails. It was impossible that Brazil could find fault with any action taken by the American Government in sending the mail to Pernambuco, where it was said to have been dumped on the wharf; that anything was done out of the regular order, for it was done in an effort to have the mail delivered in the promptest way possible. That I know to be true from careful examination. I saw the gentleman in the Department who knows more about it than anybody else, without, of course, including the Postmaster-General.

I have only one word or two more to say, and I am done with this debate. Reference has been made by several Senators, especially the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], to what I said in relation to the tariff and free-ship questions. I was complained of for going into these questions somewhat extensively the other day. I believe the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Kansas were quite as much to blame as I was for the length of my remarks.

All I desire to say now in answer to much that has been said by the Senator from New York and others is that I am opposed to protection for protection's sake, to subsidy for subsidy's sake, and to make any class of men pay anything to enrich another class, or to be taxed, except to furnish revenue to the Government, and then only to the extent that each citizen ought to be legitimately called on to furnish his part of the needed revenue. I deny the right of this Government to say to the man who ships his wheat from Dakota to Liverpool, and has to take as his portion of the foreign price only what remains after deducting all the charges of transportation from his home to the port where he is obliged to sell it, that he shall be taxed, except for the purposes of revenue, by not being allowed to buy what he needs with the money that he receives for the produce that he has raised.

When the Government of the United States undertakes to protect any class of men and to deny to any other class the right to buy what they want in the country where they have been obliged to sell in competition with the so-called paupers of the world in the foreign markets, to which they are compelled to go, and then say that they shall not buy what they need there because the Government proposes to protect other people in America, it is unjust to and discriminating against its own people. I insist that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to see to it that the money it collects shall be only what is required for its own purposes, and shall not be taken from one class to enrich another. In other words, if the man from Dakota sells wheat that he only realizes 60 cents a bushel for when sold in Liverpool, and receives a thousand dollars for it, and is offered for that thousand dollars clothes and blankets needed for himself and his family, things that he must have to keep his family warm in that rigorous climate, I insist that the men in New England shall not be allowed to compel him to pay $2,000 for these things here; yet the Government of the United States in order to enrich home manufacturers says to the exporter, "You shall not buy with the thousand dollars you get for your wheat what you are offered in the market where you are obliged to sell, but you shall bring your money home and you shall pay $2,000 for those same things to New England or Pennsylvania manufacturers." I insist that is unjust, if revenue is not the object; and I insist that it is the duty of the United States, if it undertakes to interfere with the trade of its private citizens and to compel those who sell abroad to enrich New England or Pennsylvania manufactories by our laws, to see to it that the people the Government professes to protect are protected; if we make ourselves the trustees we ought to carry out the trust to its legitimate consequence. Instead of that, under our present laws we deny the right to a man who sells his wheat in the cheapest market and in competition with the so-called paupers of the world to buy for a thousand dollars what is offered to him, and require him to pay $2,000 for them in Pennsylvania or New England, and it all goes to men who have very likely bought machinery in England or Germany or France, men who send to Canada or to Italy or to Hungary or the other markets of the world and hire the cheapest labor they can get.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BECK. Not now. I want to finish this statement. The Government gives that money to the men who buy foreign machinery; who hire the cheapest people, who import them from Hungary, Italy, Canada, anywhere. Men who come here with their cheap clothes on their backs, many of whom go to Canada as soon as they make money enough to go home. About three-fourths, as I think the records will show, of the operatives in factories in parts of New England, and especially in Rhode Island and Massachusetts, are Canadians and foreigners. I insist that the Government should not take the money from the men of the West and give it to these people. If we are going to make ourselves a trustee to dispense bounty or subsidy that has been thus procured from the men who sell their produce abroad, I insist we should go a step farther and say, "We will see to it that the manufacturers do not pocket all the bounty they receive. Their machines need no protection; they are slaves; they neither drink nor eat nor wear." The demand for protection admits that they do not intend to sell abroad; they intend only to sell to our own people and to those people who are compelled by our laws to buy from them, and that we by law compel to pay any price they see fit to ask them upon the ground that we are protecting American labor, whereas the laborers are, in a majority of cases, in protected factories, not Americans.

There is no protection to the American laborer. Any pauper can be brought here to compete with him; and when the manufacturers have made goods enough to supply the consumption for a year in six months, as they can, they close the factories, wait for higher prices, allow their laborers and their families to starve, and give them no protection at all. Carry the principle of bounty or subsidy or protection out. Let the Government be the trustee to divide up the subsidy that we demand by law for these people, and let us see to it that the laborer gets his share of the benefit. Let the Government send its officers into those great establishments and divide that money, thus extorted from others to protect manufacturers, between the laborer and the man who puts in his capital to buy machines on terms of equality; then there would be some show of fairness in the pretext that we are imposing taxes to protect American labor.

When the factory is closed waiting for higher prices, and the higher prices come when scarcity follows, does the laborer get a dollar? No; the manufacturer who owns the machinery gets it all, and the market is reduced by closed doors until he can get what he wants. The laborer who produced it, and his family, and for whose benefit all the pretense is made that this is done, are by their necessities driven away from the establishments to hunt up a living wherever they can make it.

A small part of the tax reaches the Treasury. Of course no man will buy an article that is imported unless it is cheaper than the man who makes the same article here is willing to sell his for. I repeat, no man here will buy the imported article, unless that article, after the 46 per cent. is paid and all the transportation is paid, is cheaper than the same article is offered him by the home manufacturer. Of course not. That proves that the home price is at least 46 per cent. above what he could buy it for abroad. None would be sold if that was not so.

Our people understand business. They buy the best article they can obtain for the least price. They do not care where it comes from, but every article made here must be sold here; and that is the meaning of protection, and that is all these gentlemen claim—to have a market for themselves, to make everything here and exclude everything else—sell it up to the highest point possible; and they have to sell it higher than the foreign price with the tariff and the transportation added, for nobody would buy the imported article unless it was cheaper than the article made at home. And yet, as I said the other day, only seven human beings are employed now where seventy were employed twenty years ago in our factories; the machine-owner is the only protected man; he is the lobbyist; he is the man who clamors around Congress; he is the man who pretends that he is paying his laborers higher wages, while he drives them into enforced idleness, and they are driven out, on the average, six months in the year while his factories are closed and his machines are greased, standing idle, waiting for the good days to bring a higher price, and the laborer gets no part of the benefit of that increase.

If it is intended to protect the laboring man, the man who really produces the article, the man whose labor brought it into existence by the use of the machinery that the manufacturer has, the Government of the United States ought to see to it that in the distribution of the bounty which by law she has required every consumer of this country to contribute to these articles the laborer gets his share. That sort of division no manufacturer, no advocate of protection wants or would submit to. He will pretend that he is anxious to aid labor, yet he will hire the Chinaman, the Hungarian, the Italian, the Canadian, anybody who will work 5 cents cheaper than the American, and drive him from his factory, close the door, and give him not a dollar more than he can hire anybody else for.

The demand of the protectionist is for protection to machinery, and at the same time free competition between all foreign and American labor in driving that machinery, and all the profit goes to the machine-owner, and all the want and all the starvation and all the trouble fall upon the man who performs the labor and who really gets no benefit from it, because these gentlemen refuse to compete with the world or with any other country outside under the plea that they are protecting American labor.

The laborers of this country are beginning to understand it and there will be before long in the great country west of the Mississippi River, and that producing people will thoroughly understand the false pretenses and the hypocrisy under which the Government of the United States is subsidizing a few men to make them millionaires and driving the great mass of the laborers into absolute poverty by contracting markets, curtailing manufactures, narrowing the field of labor and consumption, and making this whole people pay double what any other people pay for what they use, thus making their wages go only half as far as anybody else's wages, and forcing them to lie idle half the year, while the value of the products of the manufacturer is being doubled while their factories are closed, and all this by prohibitory laws called "protection to American industry." These are some of the reasons why I oppose the much-lauded system of protection. It protects the few who do not need it at the expense of the many whose interests the Government should guard.

Mr. HAWLEY rose.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the bill to have it printed. On behalf of the Committee on Appropriations I offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HAWLEY. But a moment. I want to put in one little peg here after the most extraordinary remarks, and I venture to say ludicrous and monstrous perversions, of the Senator from Kentucky.

I understood him to say that three-fourths of the operatives of New England were imported Canadians who made some money and went back again to Canada. Again he used the fraction of nine-tenths, speaking in the same connection. I do not know what he means or where he got his figures—"figures of speech," the Senator from Vermont says. He proceeded to demand with a great deal of vehemence that the manufacturers, the capitalists of New England, should be compelled to divide their enormous profits with the operatives, intimating that they were poor people who come to our territory, there make a little money, and go away again, and that all our laboring population is oppressed.

I have but one single statistical statement to put in there and then I end, though there is great temptation to go in. In the down-trodden and oppressed State of Connecticut, that I have the honor in part to represent, there are about 640,000 people. These down-trodden and penniless people, ground into the dirt, have $92,000,000 in the savings banks, put in by 222,000 people.

Mr. CAMERON. I move——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to make one addition to the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CAMERON. Can I have the floor immediately afterwards? I want an executive session. I make that motion.

Mr. HOAR. Will not the Senator allow me to make a statement?

Mr. CONGER. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Have I the floor or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. CAMERON. I will yield.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to state, to supplement the statement of the Senator from Connecticut, that the operatives in Massachusetts, dwelling in Massachusetts, have $270,000,000 in their savings banks, and more than 70 per cent. of that is the savings of the wage-earners in the factories; and the statements of the Senator from Kentucky are as ridiculous as can be described in parliamentary language, so far as they are applicable to them.

Mr. President, the manufacturers of the East as a rule are wage-earners who have learned their business from the bottom and who have risen to the position of masters and owners and directors of business establishments because they understand by actual experience every process. They understand the economies, the savings, the inventions which lie at the foundation of their business; and this attempt to raise a sectional cry by attacking one section of the country and by threatening that the West is to be aroused into an attack upon the East is, in my opinion, as unworthy of the Senate of the United States as it is of sound statesmanship.

COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Edmund W. Booker, of Alabama, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Alabama.

Isban Hess, of New York, to be collector of infernal revenue for the fourteenth district of New York.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 861) of Isban Hess, of New York, to be collector of internal revenue for the fourteenth district of New York, in place of James W. Bentley, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain information, they find that Mr. Hess is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Mr. Bentley, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 16, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of James W. Bentley, late collector of internal revenue for the fourteenth district of New York, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions.

But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

A resolution, as follows, was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Finance, April 6, 1886, in relation to this and all similar letters to the foregoing:

"Resolved, That the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Finance, dated March 16, 1886, or subsequently, in relation to the suspension of collectors of internal revenue, should be received and held as honest declarations made in good faith that there are no charges or papers on file in the Department reflecting in any manner against their moral or official conduct or character."

Under this statement of facts, and the fact that there is no fixed term attached to the office of collector of internal revenue, the committee recommend the confirmation of Mr. Hess.

Charles H. Henshaw, of Rhode Island, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Rhode Island.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Finance; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Finance have had under consideration the nomination (No. 870) of Charles H. Henshaw, of Rhode Island, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Rhode Island, in place of Elisha H. Rhodes, suspended, and, so far as they have been able to obtain the information, they find that Charles H. Henshaw is a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office, and that there are no charges or papers on file reflecting upon the character of Elisha H. Rhodes, suspended, as will appear from the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 18, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 17, 1886, asking whether or not "there are any charges on file against the official or moral character of Elisha H. Rhodes, late collector of internal revenue for the district of Rhode Island, suspended," is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspension. But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the order of business for Friday evening sessions be enlarged so as to include private bills from the Military Committee correcting the records of private soldiers, but not to include any bill for the restoration of an officer to the Army, or the giving any increased pay or rank to any officer in the Army or upon the retired-list.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report, the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. OLIN WELLBORN,
S. W. PEEL,
B. W. PERKINS.
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the report just submitted I desire simply to say that the increases made to this bill by the Senate amendments amounted to $231,720, while the reductions amounted to $162,000. The conference committee has somewhat changed this result; and in the bill as finally agreed on in conference the Senate increases are $113,000 for school purposes, sundries $47,000, making $160,000; while the decreases are $110,800. The appropriations embraced in the bill, according to the report just submitted, are $49,000 in excess of the bill as it passed the House. This is, I believe, the only statement I desire to make.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, if I caught correctly the reading of the report there is among the educational clauses of the bill an item of increase of $58,000, or thereabouts, for the Haskell Institute in Kansas, that item making provision for increasing the number of pupils in the institution, which, by the way, is not on any reservation, from three hundred and fifty, the maximum heretofore, I believe, to five hundred. I should be glad if the gentleman from Texas would give us some reason for so large an increase. It may be all right, but still I think there ought to be some statement explanatory of the matter.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], who will make a statement in reference to the increase in that item.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, this appropriation is for the purpose of completing the building of the Haskell Institute as originally designed. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has suggested, the accommodations of that school at present are sufficient for only three hundred and fifty pupils, the number now there, but it was originally intended that the school should accommodate five hundred Indian children.

Last December there were in that institution three hundred and twenty-two children. Since that time the institution has been filled to its utmost capacity. The present superintendent, Mr. Grabowskii, a very competent officer, who has had some experience, I think, in industrial schools in the gentleman's own State, was before our committee to represent the necessities of this institute. This appropriation was also recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by the Secretary of the Interior. The superintendent of Indian education says in his recent report that of all the industrial schools this, with proper accommodations, will be the most useful. Situated at Lawrence, Kans., it is only 150 miles from the Indian Territory. Within a radius of 40 miles there are to-day Indian reservations peopled by Indians who desire to avail themselves of the benefits of this school if the accommodations can be made sufficient. The superintendent assured our committee that without duress, without violence, without force, this school, if enlarged so as to provide for five hundred children, could readily be filled to the extent of its capacity from the Indian Territory and from the great reservations of the North and West.

The people of the city of Lawrence contributed for the purposes of this school, when it was located there by the Government, 320 acres of excellent land, land capable of a high state of cultivation, upon which a large portion of the vegetables and produce used in the school can be raised. Building material and labor are cheap at Lawrence; and, in my judgment, at no point in the country could these accommodations be secured with less expenditure to the Government than they can be at Lawrence. Hence, as I have suggested, the Committee on Indian Affairs had recommended this very appropriation before it was inserted in the Indian appropriation bill. We had recommended it, however, as independent legislation. I ask that the report made by the committee, in connection with the bill which we reported providing for this expenditure, be read as part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 3388:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3388) making an appropriation for the completion of Haskell Institute, an Indian school at Lawrence, Kans., submit the following report:

As originally designed, the Haskell Institute was intended to accommodate 500 Indian scholars. In its present and unfinished condition its maximum capacity is 350 scholars. On the 19th day of December last there were in attendance upon this school 322 Indian boys and girls, and since that time several have been admitted, so that it is now nearly or quite filled to its maximum capacity. The work of this school has commended it to all visitors and to all who interest themselves in the cause of Indian education and Indian civilization. It was opened to scholars less than two years ago, but its progress has been such that the urgent necessity for additional accommodations is apparent to all who have given the matter attention, and has the warm approval of the superintendent of Indian education, the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of the Interior.

The present superintendent of the school, Arthur Grabowskii, was before your committee and gave an interesting and detailed statement of its management and accomplishments, and, encouraged by the results, he earnestly urged upon the attention of the committee the necessity of this appropriation. The school is located on 320 acres of land adjoining the beautiful city of Lawrence, on the Kansas River, and has many advantages in its favor as an Indian industrial school. It is only 150 miles from the Indian Territory, and within 40 miles of it are Indian reservations, peopled by the wards of the Government, who should be qualified for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, and the superintendent, Mr. Grabowskii, assured the committee that if the additional accommodations were provided he could, within a brief period, fill the school to its full capacity by Indian children, voluntarily offered him from the Indian Territory and the great reservations of the North and West. Situated as the school is in the great grain-producing and cattle and hog raising State of Kansas, supplies can be obtained for it at much less cost to the Government than in most sections of the country, and the 320 acres of land belonging to the school, and donated to the Government by the public-spirited citizens of Lawrence, in consequence of the location of this industrial institute at the gates of their city, is rich and productive and capable of a high state of cultivation, and from which very much can be raised, thus lessening the burdens to the Government in sustaining the institute.

The University of Kansas is also located at Lawrence, which will give to the ambitious Indian who is not content with his industrial education an opportunity of completing it in an institution of learning second to none in the land. Building material and labor are cheap at Lawrence, and we know of no place in the country where the Government can provide these needed additional educational advantages for the Indians for less money than at the site of this industrial school. In proof of this, special attention is called to the report of the board of visitors which accompanies this report, and in which the necesstity of these additional accommodations is suggested and their character and estimated cost are given. In his last annual report the superintendent of Indian education has this to say of the Lawrence school:

"Haskell Institute, at Lawrence, Kans., was established in 1884. In September of that year it was opened with one hundred and twenty-five pupils. This school is in need of more buildings, and with adequate facilities may be made the most useful of all the training schools. There is every reason to believe that the present superintendent, Mr. Grabowskii, will manage it with much more than ordinary ability."

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior are of the opinion that the bill should be amended so as to authorize the purchase of additional land. In this opinion your committee concur, and recommend that the bill be so amended as to authorize, from the money appropriated, the purchase of 40 acres of additional land for the accommodation and use of the school. The letters of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and copies of resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of the city of Lawrence, are attached hereto and made part of this report.

In this report your committee do not deem it necessary to enter into a discussion of the Indian educational system, but, believing that great good is being accomplished by this Lawrence school, the passage of the bill is recommended, with an amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. The communications which are attached are recommendations of the Commissioner and Secretary.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this point: The Committee on Indian Affairs seem to have introduced a separate bill for this object; and I presume under our rules it might be subject to the point of order in the House. We will have sooner or later to meet the issue whether the Senate has the power of introducing legislation upon appropriation bills, that body heretofore having resisted efforts on the part of the House to do the same thing. It will have to be determined whether the Senate can escape the responsibility in that particular. I do not know that it is desirable on our part to object in this instance, but it is necessary attention should be called to the fact while the House does not put legislation upon appropriation bills, yet there seems to be a way by which the Senate can put legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the House yielded in regard to this item because we had already considered the subject and recommended it separately to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. But in a separate bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, in a separate bill. And as we believed the appropriation was right and should be passed we yielded in this respect to the managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WELLBORN. I think it is just to the committee of conference to say I do not think this amendment violates any rule of this House, because it is an appropriation in continuation of a public work already in operation.

Mr. RANDALL. My remarks were only intended for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the Committee on Indian Affairs properly, as I think, wished to avoid any doubt on this subject, and therefore introduced an independent proposition to cover it.

Mr. WELLBORN. Allow me to make a suggestion. My recollection is—but the gentleman from Kansas can state more accurately—that this recommendation did not come from the Indian Office until after the committee had passed on the general appropriation bill.

Mr. PERKINS. That is so. The letter from the Indian Department was not received until after the Indian appropriation bill had been perfected.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course I raise no issue in reference to this matter, and my only object has been to call attention to the fact that sooner or later we will have to meet the issue which is presented in this case; and that is that while we have debarred ourselves from putting legislation on appropriation bills, the Senate seems to have a mode of doing it, as is evident in this instance.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The report was adopted.

Mr. WELLBORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER.

Mr. CRISP submitted the following report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company of Texas to maintain a bridge across Red River, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

CHARLES F. CRISP,
W. D. BYNUM,
A. J. WEAVER.
Managers on the part of the House.
S. J. R. McMILLAN,
O. D. CONGER,
G. G. VEST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires reports of conference committees shall be accompanied by statements showing the effect of their adoption, but if the point be not made, the question will be stated on the adoption of the report.

Mr. CRISP. The only amendment of the Senate to this bill is to strike out the words, "and customary in said locality;" so it will read:

Shall be permitted to charge and take such rates of toll for crossing said bridge as may be reasonable, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4731) which I now send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows, namely:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment adopted by the Senate and agree to the same.

JAMES T. JOHNSTON,
GEORGE W. GEDDES,
Managers on the part of the House.
AUSTIN F. PIKE,
GEO. F. HOAR,
JAMES K. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will be reported.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment will be read.

There was no objection.

The amendment was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Page 66, after line 17, insert "Mississippi: To Catharine C. B. Merrill, executrix of the last will and testament of Ayres B. Merrill, from said State, $67,726.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be some explanation of this action on the part of the conference.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a House bill making allowances for certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, as indicated by its title. It was amended in the Senate by the adoption of the amendment which has just been reported, allowing to Catharine C. B. Merrill, executrix of Ayres B. Merrill, deceased, of Mississippi, the sum of $67,726.

This claim, Mr. Speaker, was investigated by the Quartermaster-General under a special act of Congress, approved February 13, 1885. He made his report to Congress under that act during the present session, and recommended an allowance for quartermaster and commissary stores in favor of this claimant of $50,382.50. The Committee on War Claims has investigated the report and the proof as submitted by the Quartermaster-General, and on the 15th day of April a report was submitted from that committee recommending the allowance of the amount reported by the Quartermaster-General; that is to say, $50,382.50. It is proper for me to state, Mr. Speaker, that the agent of the Quartermaster-General, who was sent upon the premises to investigate this claim, reported that the claimant lost $67,726; but the assistant quartermaster-general held that inasmuch as the claimant had submitted a statement of his account, showing the amount of the loss, about ten years subsequent to the war, and had only claimed a total amount of $50,382.50, the Quartermaster-General did not feel that he was warranted in recommending an appropriation of a larger sum, notwithstanding the fact that the agent's report shows the loss of the larger sum, or $67,726.

The Committee on War Claims reported a bill recommending an allowance for the smaller sum, $50,382.50. That bill has its proper place on the Calendar of the House. The Senate, however, having a bill before it also, examined the facts and the report of the Quartermaster-General, and they recommended the larger sum, $67,726. They therefore amended the House bill by making the allowance which I have mentioned. The committee of conference, having discussed the matter fully, came to the conclusion they would concur with the Senate in recommending the adoption of the Senate amendment, and allowing the larger sum. Those are the facts.

The members of this body on the committee of conference the more readily assented to the report submitted because they are satisfied that the proof is ample to show the justice and correctness of the claim. They are opposed, however, to the policy of amending the bill, which is intended only to make an appropriation for the allowance of claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury. They thought, and still think, this bill should provide only for such claims. Rather than endanger the passage of this bill, however, which would inflict such great injury upon over one thousand small claimants therein provided for, they forego their opposition to the Senate amendment and recommend that the House recede from its disagreement thereto.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. As there may be some misunderstanding about this matter, I wish to state the facts as I understand them. This claim was originally filed before Congress, and Congress passed a special act authorizing the Quartermaster-General to inquire into the amount that was due. Mr. Merrill, some ten years after the war, while he was in New York, and in poor health, made out a memorandum of his losses, amounting to nearly $51,000. A special act of Congress authorized the Quartermaster-General to investigate the amount of his losses. The Quartermaster's Department sent a special agent down there, who was a very efficient man, and he found $67,000 due to Mr. Merrill under the act of Congress. When he made his report to the Quartermaster-General the Quartermaster-General held he was bound by the memorandum as made by Mr. Merrill, and not by the finding of the special agent. That report came before our committee, the Committee on War Claims of the House, and we followed the finding of the Quartermaster-General, and reported a bill to this House recommending payment to Mr. Merrill's executrix of a sum of nearly $51,000—I forget the precise amount.

Now, the Senate amends this bill by putting in the whole amount, $67,000, instead of $51,000. The $51,000 stand in the same condition as the rest of the 4th July claims do. Sixty-seven thousand dollars is proved just as conclusively as the $51,000. And while the committee of conference can not say under the proof that the $67,000 is not due, this state of facts was presented—that either we had to consent to allow the amendment of this bill by the insertion of what we all consider is a just claim, a claim that is amply proven—there is no question about the loyalty of the party—we had either to consent to that or jeopardize the whole bill and the allowances to eight hundred or a thousand loyal people for small sums.

The committee agree the whole amount was proven. The only reason why the War Claims Committee did not report in favor of the $67,000 was because the Quartermaster-General had followed the memorandum as made by this party. The whole of this $67,000 is as clearly proven as the $51,000. I have no doubt in my mind about these parties being entitled to the $67,000; but as I have said, we followed the finding of the Quartermaster-General in that respect.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXATION FOR PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. HISCOCK. On Saturday evening the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], from the Committee on Rules, reported this resolution:

Resolved, That it shall be in order when any general bill or proposition to increase the rates or amounts of pensions or to grant pensions to persons not previously entitled thereto by law is under consideration to amend the same so as to provide by taxation or otherwise for the payment thereof; but no such amendment shall be in order unless the net revenue provided for shall be thereby set apart for the sole purpose of paying such increased pensions.

I desire to say that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and myself, members of the Committee on Rules, dissent from that report for the reason that we believe it is a discrimination against one class of legislation which ought not to be tolerated and which is vicious in practice.

Mr. MORRISON. It is neither a discrimination against any class of legislation nor vicious in practice. It is worthy of general application whenever practicable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to call up this report, although it is privileged, in the absence of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. I may state, however, in further reply to the gentleman from New York, that the purpose of this resolution is to secure the payment of the very obligations which the gentleman professedly so much desires to have paid, and they can not be promptly paid without it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have not attempted to debate the resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. Nor I.

Mr. HISCOCK. I simply stated the ground briefly for our dissent.

Mr. MORRISON. Exactly; and I gave my reason quite as briefly for our approval.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to call up the other resolution reported by me for the Committee on Rules in relation to the hour of meeting and adjournment.

The Clerk read the resolution offered by Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, and referred to the committee, as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next the House of Representatives meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on each day.

The substitute reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Monday, May 10, during the present session, the House shall meet each day at 11 a. m. and adjourn each day at 5 o'clock p. m.; but this resolution shall not interfere with any orders heretofore made for recess.

Mr. MORRISON. The substitute fixes a later day than the original resolution. It proposes a day on or about which it has been usual at former sessions to meet earlier than 12 o'clock. The committee for this purpose amended the resolution or provided by the substitute that this order shall take effect on the 10th of May, which is next Monday. There has been also added a provision to the effect that the hour of adjournment shall be fixed at 5 o'clock. This would give us a continuous session of six hours each day, and with committee work and other duties this is quite long enough.

The members here can not fail to observe the difficulty we have in keeping a quorum present for the transaction of business, and it is believed that if the hour was fixed at which the House would certainly adjourn the gentlemen who now absent themselves would grace the House with their presence until that hour, and we would not be so often as we now are without a quorum. Of course it would be in the power of the House to extend the session. Unless some gentleman cares to discuss the matter, I will now move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will my colleague, before he makes that motion, allow me to say a word in regard to fixing the hour of daily adjournment?

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the power of the House, or of any legislative body, to adjourn at any time is one of the most universally recognized rights that a parliamentary body has, and I think it would be without precedent and contrary to the spirit of the history of the House to fix arbitrarily by rule an hour at which we must adjourn every day. The House should always be permitted to control the time of its adjournment, and I think this rule, if adopted, would prove very inconvenient in practice. For instance, we might be considering an important bill and five minutes' additional time might be sufficient to complete its consideration, but if this rule were in operation we could not have a vote on the question of extending the session before the arrival of the time for adjournment, especially if there was a call for tellers.

Any form of filibustering begun just before 5 o'clock would prevent the extension of the time and would carry the business over to another day. I think that portion of the resolution which requires the House to adjourn at 5 o'clock (except on Fridays, when there is an order for an evening session) ought not to be adopted, and, if my colleague will permit, I will move to strike out that provision before the previous question is asked for.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, it was believed by the committee that a six-hour session daily was long enough, and, in fact, much longer than we have been able usually to get gentlemen to stay here and work, and we hoped that by adopting this rule gentlemen who now absent themselves would be induced to stay until the end of the daily session, when they knew just the hour at which the session would end.

I wish to say also to my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] that in the earlier days of the Republic, to which he often refers as the better days of the Republic, this was the rule for thirty or forty years and the adjournment occurred at a fixed hour. I think the House had better try it, and if it does not work well it can be changed. I did not originate nor am I wedded to it, but certainly there ought to be something done to keep gentlemen in their places here so that the work of the session may go forward and the House not be compelled every day to spend part of the time in the endeavor to secure a quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, a number of special orders have been made which give to certain committees certain days, and when a committee has had the day assigned to it, it cannot command any further time. Now if we were bound to adjourn at 5 o'clock, and the consideration of a bill was almost completed, we would be unable to stay here to complete the consideration of the bill, even though the majority might be so inclined, and it would pass into the catalogue as unfinished business.

Mr. MORRISON. There is a provision in the rule that it is not to interfere with prior orders.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, whenever any order of business is under consideration which the House desires to continue after 5 o'clock I have no doubt that the House will take action in the direction of continuing it; but my experience has been, and I think the experience of every member of this House has been the same, that whenever we attempt to enforce the continuance of the daily session beyond the sentiment of the House, the good feeling of the House—whenever, if you please, we attempt to override the disposition to filibuster, we always lose time by it; and I heartily concur with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that if we come here at 11 o'clock in the morning and stay until 5 in the afternoon every day we will accomplish quite as much as we can accomplish by the adoption of any other rule.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it takes about forty minutes to call and verify the roll, and if this resolution be adopted fixing an arbitrary hour for the daily adjournment of the House, I very much fear that at about twenty minutes after 4 o'clock, or soon thereafter, a number of gentlemen here will come to the conclusion that it is too late in the day for another yea-and-nay vote and will take their hats and canes and walk leisurely home.

Mr. WILLIS. Will not the adoption of such an order, fixing definitely the hour of daily adjournment, present an invitation and a temptation for some one to filibuster almost every day?

Mr. MORRISON. There is nothing in the rule to prevent the House taking a recess to a later hour, and there is nothing to prevent the House adjourning earlier if it desires.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Practically do we not adjourn now at 5 o'clock almost every day?

Mr. MORRISON. A number of gentlemen—many gentlemen—adjourn at 1 or 2 o'clock [laughter], and the object of this provision is to try to induce those who now adjourn so early to give us the benefit of their presence until 5 o'clock.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that that remark has no application to me. [Laughter].

Mr. MORRISON. No; nor to any other gentleman—personally we are all here.

The SPEAKER. What is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]?

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out so much of the resolution as provides for the daily adjournment at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moves to amend the resolution by striking out the words "and adjourn each day at 5 o'clock p. m." The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. Under that rule, if adopted, when the hour of 5 o'clock arrived would the Speaker adjourn the House without a formal motion to that effect?

The SPEAKER. He would, just as the Chair now on Fridays announces the recess.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Could the majority of the House, just prior to 5 o'clock, move to take recess for half an hour?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; or to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. But unless your recess was ordered before 5 o'clock arrived, the House would adjourn at 5.

The SPEAKER. If the hour of 5 o'clock arrived and no order had been made to the contrary, the Chair would of course declare the House adjourned.

Mr. SPRINGER. Pending the vote on the motion for a recess.

The question was taken on the amendment moved by Mr. SPRINGER; and there were—ayes 58, noes 88.

Mr. SKINNER and Mr. McMILLIN called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER (having counted the affirmative vote). There are 28 in favor of ordering the yeas and nays—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER (after a count). There are only 28 voting to order tellers—not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. BLAND and Mr. DIBBLE. Count the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no count of "the other side" on this question. The rules require one-fifth of a quorum to order tellers. Is the other side desired on the question of ordering the yeas and nays?

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes, sir; I ask for a vote on the other side.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is too late.

The SPEAKER. It is too late if objection is made.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are refused, the yeas and nays are refused, and the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "5 o'clock" and inserting "6 o'clock."

The SPEAKER. No further amendment is in order at present, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has demanded the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to recommit the report to the Committee on Rules.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was not agreed to; there being—ayes 27, noes 123.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon ordering the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, is this open to debate?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been debated.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendment was debated, not the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That was debate on the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution, for which the resolution just adopted was reported as a substitute, will, if there be no onjection, lie on the table.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Several members demanded the regular order.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to immediately adjust, or cause to be adjusted, each of the railroad land grants heretofore made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads within the State of Kansas.

SEC. 2. That if it shall appear upon the completion of such adjustments, respectively, that lands have been certified by the Secretary of the Interior to or for the benefit of either of said railroad companies in excess of the amount to which it was lawfully entitled, or that lands have been so certified which were reserved from the operations of said grants, or settled upon under the homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture laws by bona fide settlers, within granted limits, prior to the definite location of said roads, or settled upon under the said homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture laws by bona fide settlers, within the indemnity limits, prior to the selection of said lands by the railroad companies, or that lands not granted or lands not earned by said companies have been so certified, then and in that case it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to commence and prosecute in the proper courts the necessary proceedings to cancel all patents, certifications, and evidence of title heretofore issued for such lands, and to restore the title thereof to the United States.

SEC. 3. That if, in the adjustment of said grants, or any other railroad, wagon-road, or canal grant, it shall appear that the homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture claim or entry of any bona fide settler has heretofore been erroneously canceled or his application denied on account of any railroad grant or the withdrawal of public lands for railroad purposes, such settler, upon application, shall be reinstated in all his rights and allowed to perfect his entry and receive a patent from the United States for the tract so settled upon, by complying with the public-land laws, where he has remained in possession of the land, claiming his right thereto under any claim under the general land laws of the United States: Provided, That such settler has not since located another claim or entry in lieu of the one so erroneously canceled: And provided further, That if any of said settlers shall have removed from said States, or do not renew their application to perfect their titles to said lands within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, then such of said lands as remain shall be restored to the public domain and be disposed of under the public-land laws, and the bona fide settlers residing thereon shall have priority of right under said laws: Provided also, That this section shall not apply to any tract of land in possession of any party deriving title under any of said railroad grants, when such possession is in conflict with parties in possession, under claim under the general laws of the United States, as contemplated in the first clause of this section down to the first proviso.

SEC. 4. That all other of said lands which have been so wrongfully, and without authority of law, certified or patented to said railroad companies, and which have been sold by said companies, or either of them, prior to the date of the approval of this act, the party or person so purchasing shall have the right to the lands so purchased upon making proof of the fact of such purchase, at the proper local land office, within one year after the adjustment of said grants, respectively, and patents shall issue to the party entitled thereto; and the Secretary of the Interior, on behalf of the United States, shall demand payment from the railroad company or companies of an amount equal to $2.50 per acre for all such lands so sold within the granted limits, and $1.25 per acre for all such lands so sold within the indemnity limits of the grants respectively: Provided, That said lands shall have been sold by said company or companies for that or a greater price per acre; and if not so sold, then said companies, respectively, shall pay to the United States an amount equal to the price per acre so received by them from such sales; and in case of neglect or refusal of said company or companies to make payment as herein provided within one year after the demand shall have been made, the Attorney-General shall cause suit or suits to be brought against such company or companies for the amount claimed: Provided, That all lands so wrongfully certified or patented, and not sold by said companies, or either of them, shall be immediately restored to the public domain, to be disposed of under the public-land laws: And provided further, That any lands heretofore claimed by said companies, or either of them, under their respective grants, but not certified or patented, which, upon a proper adjustment, shall be found not to belong to said companies, shall be restored to the public domain under the public-land laws, and bona fide settlers residing thereon shall have priority of right under said laws.

SEC. 5. That no more lands shall be certified or conveyed to the State of Kansas, or to any corporation or individual, for the benefit of either of the raiload companies herein mentioned, by the Department of the Interior, until the said grants, respectively, shall have been adjusted as by this act required.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. VAN EATON. I demand a second.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. VAN EATON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON].

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 120, noes 9.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. There is a second ordered; and under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the motion, and fifteen minutes in opposition. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under the Pacific Railway act of 1862, a large grant of land was made to the Kansas Pacific Railroad, and under the act of 1863 a very large grant was made to the State of Kansas for several roads, chief of which were the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé; and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas; and the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston roads. It was the practice of the Government to allow the companies, as a block of road was completed, to make selection of their lands, and it appears that under that practice there has been patented an excess of land to all these companies. This bill raises no question as to forfeiture because of non-completion of the roads in time. It provides for the final settlement of these grants. Where an excess of land is found to have been patented or certified it provides that such land shall be restored to the public domain, and it also protects the rights of homesteaders and bona fide purchasers. I shall content myself, Mr. Speaker, with this general statement as to the necessity for the bill, and will yield so much of my time as he may desire to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], who will explain the legal bearing and effect of the provision of the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] has presented a minority report as to this bill, and I prefer to reserve the time that has been yielded to me by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] until the gentleman from Mississippi shall have been heard.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, so far as that is concerned there was no understanding between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and myself that I would follow the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON]; but that was on the assumption that the gentleman from Kansas was going to say something that I could follow. [Laughter.] As he has not done so, but has turned over the whole subject to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], I think I have a perfect right to "go back" on that agreement, and wait until I hear something in favor of the bill, for I have not heard anything yet. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to consume any of the time of the House, and yet, because of the amount that is involved in this bill, and because several gentlemen sitting near have asked me what it contains, I may perhaps ask the attention of the House for five minutes, in which time I think I can satisfy gentlemen that there ought not to be any hesitation about passing the bill. The facts upon which this bill is based are these: In 1863 an act of Congress was passed making a large donation of lands in the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of five different railroads, the principal of them being the Atchison, Topeka and Sante Fé; the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston; and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas.

The amount of acreage involved in relation to the Missouri, Kansas and Texas road was 1,520,000 acres; as to the Atchison, Topeka and Sante Fe, 2,920,000, and as to the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston, 840,000 acres. The act of Congress provided that all these roads should be constructed within ten years, and they were so constructed. They have earned whatever land they were entitled to under the law by the construction of their roads. But by lax administration in the Interior Department it turns out that a large acreage of land has been certified to these railroad companies in excess of the amount to which they were entitled. In advance of construction land was certified to the State—the State in this case acting as trustee for the railroad companies—and in 1873 it appeared upon the books of the Interior Department that large areas of land had been certified to the State of Kansas for the benefit of these roads in excess of that to which they were entitled. And yet the books of the Interior Department show that the grants have never yet been adjusted with reference to any one of these three roads. I hold in my hand an official letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, written in 1883, in which he shows, with reference to one of these roads, the Atchison, Topeka and Sante Fé, that an excess of something like 20,000 acres of land has been certified to that road.

Lands aggregating 73,351 acres have been certified to the other companies to which the Interior Department says they are not entitled, and to which the railway companies themselves concede that they are not entitled. Matters standing in this way, the Interior Department has requested these railway companies to reconvey the General Government such lands as have been improperly certified to them and to which they were not entitled. For some reason, best known to themselves, the railway companies have declined to do that, and of course, as every lawyer knows, the title having passed to the companies, the Government can only revest itself by directing proceedings through the Attorney-General's Office for the cancellation of the patents on the certified lists which in some of these cases conveyed titles. These roads were completed in 1873. Thirteen years have elapsed since that time; and although in many cases these lands to which the railroad companies concede they have no title were certified years ago, they still retain control and possession of them. Hence the necessity for the passage of this bill.

Mr. LONG. Are they improving the lands?

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir. Some they have sold, some they simply hold.

The first section of the bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to complete the adjustment of these grants. In other words, it simply directs him to do what it is his duty to do without legislation; but in view of the fact that all these years have elapsed since the roads were constructed and nothing has been done with reference to determining what particular tracts of land to which the railroad companies were not entitled have been certified to them, the first section of the bill directs this adjustment.

The second section provides that where in any case parties have gone into possession of these lands as settlers under the general land laws—and when I say "these lands" I mean the lands to which the railroad companies are not entitled—and have remained in possession of the lands down to this time, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to recognize the claims of the settlers thus in possession. In addition to that it is provided that the Attorney-General shall begin suit to cancel such patents and certifications as the railroad companies were not entitled to under the granting act.

The third section provides that where parties are in possession as purchasers in good faith from the railroad companies, their title shall be validated upon proof of that fact; and also that where the lands have thus been sold to settlers who are now in possession, the railroad companies shall be responsible to the General Government for the amount of money which they have received from the settler, not exceeding $2.50 per acre for land within the granted limits, and $1.25 per acre for land within the indemnity limits; these being the prices fixed by the general land law in like cases.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the bill throw upon the purchaser from the railroad company the burden of showing his title?

Mr. PAYSON. It provides that the purchaser shall make proof at the nearest land office that he purchased in good faith and is still in possession; and upon presenting such proof he will receive a patent from the Government. The only onus thrown upon the settler is that he shall go to the nearest land office and make proof of the fact that he has purchased this land from the railroad company in good faith and is in possession thereof.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Is there anything in the amendment of the bill that makes it apply to other States?

Mr. PAYSON. There is. It is provided that the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed as rapidly as may be to adjust land grants in other States.

Mr. LORE. If the railroad company received for any of these lands more than it is required to pay back to the Government, what becomes of the excess?

Mr. PAYSON. The railroad company keeps it. We do not attempt to get from the railroad company any more than the Government price for the lands.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose parties who purchased of the railroad company in good faith are not in actual possession?

Mr. PAYSON. It does not matter. If they have purchased in good faith from the railroad company they are protected.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. Under this bill, how will the excess of lands certified to the railroad companies be determined?

Mr. PAYSON. The bill does not undertake to direct the Secretary of the Interior as to any method of adjustment. We could not do that if we so desired. We simply provide that he shall go on and make the adjustment.

I will reserve the remainder of my time, if I have said anything which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] deems worthy of answer.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, my objections to this bill are manifold. In the first place, there is no necessity for it. The bill provides in effect that the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed to adjust these railroad grants, and that the Attorney-General shall then proceed to recover for the United States any excess. The bill, in other words, proposes to confer on these officers powers which have been conceded to them from the formation of the Government. I may be permitted to say that as a member of the Public Lands Committee I have not been able either in the last Congress or in this to see the slightest necessity for the passage of this bill. On the other hand, the evils which may result from its passage are manifold. I contend that no good can be accomplished by a measure which simply authorizes the law officer of the Government and the head of the proper Department to do that which it is their duty now to do. More than that, by this bill they are required to proceed to seek proof for the purpose of disarranging matters and unsettling titles which have been settled perhaps for more than a score of years. This is another objection which I have to the bill.

I have inquired of the gentleman from Kansas the author of the bill, and this at least is a bill which no one will dispute with him the honor of paternity, for it is certain no other man in this House could have draughted such a bill—I have inquired, I say, of that gentleman, the author of the bill, why the people of Kansas needed it; and never yet have I been able to get an answer from him to that question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I will answer the gentleman now.

Mr. VAN EATON. Do so in your own time.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And it is this: One million and a half of acres of land these railroads have acquired to which by law they are not entitled, and this bill is for the purpose of securing the restoration of those lands, amounting to one million and a half of acres, to the public domain. Secondly, settlers and bona fide purchasers without some such law could not complete their titles, and tens of thousands of acres in the hands of settlers would be left hung up.

Mr. VAN EATON. Why can that not be as well settled without it as with it?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. For the reason that a bona fide settler, under the operation of the law as it now stands, can not obtain a title.

Mr. VAN EATON. That brings me to one of the remarkable features of this bill. It provides, in case certain settlers are on land which shall turn out in the readjustment did not belong to the railroad company when it sold it to the settler, what shall be done. To my mind it is a most remarkable provision. It says, "We will give you the land, but make the railroad company pay the price." The trouble, to my mind, is just this: If the railroad sold that to which it had no title, as a matter of course the vendee has recourse on the warranty, but this bill attempts to make the railroad responsible to the United States. That is to say, if they sold land and gave no title they are not to account to the purchaser, they are not to account to the vendee, but the United States accounts to them or guarantees the title, and then turns upon the railroad and says, "You pay us. You do not pay the man whose title you guaranteed, but we will step in and fix that title, and then you will pay us." To my mind it is a novel proposition of law. As a matter of course, if the railroad sold without guarantee the purchasers in that case would be helpless.

I take it if such land grants were adjusted without intervention of law, and it should be found that a certain number of acres had been overcertified and the railroad had sold these lands to innocent purchasers, the railroad, as a matter of course, on final adjustment would lose the land, and the purchasers, in there in good faith, would have the right of possessing themselves of those lands.

Mr. Speaker, there is another objection to this bill. There are entirely too many matters involved in it to pass it under a suspension of the rules without careful consideration by the House.

I will call attention, for instance, to the third section of the bill, which provides:

That if, in the adjustment of said grants, or any other railroad, wagon-road, or canal grant, it shall appear that the homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture claim or entry of any bona fide settler has heretofore been erroneously canceled or his application denied on account of any railroad grant or the withdrawal of public lands for railroad puposes, such settler, upon application, shall be reinstated in all his rights, and allowed to perfect his entry and receive a patent from the United States for the tract so settled upon, by complying with the public-land laws, where he has remained in possession of the land, claiming his right thereto under any claim under the general land laws of the United States.

They can under it cancel every railroad grant in the United States. At least it opens a field of litigation which no man can see the end of—that is, if that bill were to be passed by Congress. That is another reason why I object to it.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VAN EATON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. Is it not a fact, instead of opening a field of litigation, it provides there shall be no litigation whatever, but the whole matter shall be settled in the Interior Department? I assert that to be the fact.

Mr. VAN EATON. What, then, has the Attorney-General to do?

Mr. PAYSON. You provide in the third section these erroneous entries are to be canceled.

Mr. VAN EATON. But suppose the Secretary of the Interior does not settle according to the belief of the parties interested?

Mr. PAYSON. But the section simply provides that if there has been an entry erroneously canceled, the Secretary of the Interior shall reinstate the settler; and hence this is for his protection, and without sending him to the courts, as the gentleman seems to apprehend.

Mr. VAN EATON. That may be all true; but I suppose the gentleman will not tell me that this does not apply to every other land-grant road in the United States?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly it does; wherever there has been an over-certification. That was the intent of the committee.

Mr. BAYNE. It ought to apply to all.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Why ought it not apply to all?

Mr. PAYSON. I am speaking now of what the bill contains, not of what it does not contain.

Mr. VAN EATON. There have been about 50,000,000 acres of land certified for railroads completed, confessedly completed in terms.

Now another evil of this bill, to which I wish to call attention, is that it proposes a readjustment by a different rule from any which has heretofore prevailed for the last forty years, a rule essentially at variance with any heretofore in force, by which the readjustments have been made, and settlers and purchasers might in good faith come into quiet and peaceable possession of their holdings, and it is this: that the granted limits shall be construed and computed according to the meandering lines of the road. That is the old rule; but the proposition now is to turn all of that over and run a straight line from the starting-point to the terminus and readjust every grant on that straight line. I understand that to be the proposition now pending in the Interior Department.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. VAN EATON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. Where do you find anything of that kind in this bill?

Mr. VAN EATON. It is not in the bill, and that is just what is the matter. If the gentleman wants to know about that he will find it in the report of the minority of the committee, which that committee made from the best information they could get about the construction of the law by the present Commissioner of the General Land Office.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this report is better than any speech I can make, and I will ask that it be read in my own time, as I would like to have it go into the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. VAN EATON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following views of the minority:

The undersigned fully concur in all measures which provide for the recovery by the United States of all lands heretofore granted for the construction of railroads which have not been heretofore earned by such construction. But they can not so concur in the majority report upon the present bill, because they are unable to discover any existing necessity for such proposed legislation.

Grants to aid in the construction of canals and railroads cover a period extending from 1828 to 1871. More than 50,000,000 acres of land have been conveyed to States and corporations in satisfaction of grants, wherein the condition of seasonable construction has been fully met. The principles of measurement and rules of construction applied in all such grants find their basis established at the very commencement of the system, and under such principles and rules these millions of acres have been conveyed. Many of the grants for the construction of railroads have been entirely adjusted in accordance with these long-established rules and principles, and it is very certain that the titles thus conveyed thereunder have passed into the hands of thousands of innocent purchasers for value, whose labor and investment have largely enhanced the value of such lands. Titles throughout the settled portions of the West rest largely upon the integrity of these ancient adjustments, which it is the declared purpose of this bill to now re-open and disturb.

Whatever changes in the construction of the law may have occurred in recent years, it is now proposed to apply to all railroad grants and to reopen as an original matter questions determined by the proper administrative officers of the Government many years since, and on the faith of which determination these titles have been created and put forth upon the world.

The assumed basis for this threatened destruction of property rights springs from the declaration of the present Commissioner of the General Land Office, who finds an established basis of measurement determining the lateral limits of these grants which has been in force for nearly forty years not in accord with his construction of the law, and who thereupon announces the determination to readjust all such grants, and, of necessity, to produce new results, regardless of all that has been hitherto done and in disregard of all its executed consequences. There has been no argument before nor consideration by the committee as to the soundness of this new method of measurement as matter of law, nor the propriety, from either a legal or equitable standpoint, of thus attempting to change the construction and practice of forty years in order to accomplish results which may disturb titles long since vested and which have become the basis of community property rights.

Titles to reality in all settled communities which have stood the test of time, and often of judicial scrutiny in controversies between private litigants, should not be clouded by attack through the judicial tribunals or otherwise. And certainly legislation which compels adjustment of these railroad grants where the titles have stood for many years unquestioned, and passed from hand to hand as the representatives of values, should not be had upon a mere assumption of error in the principles and practice of the administrative officers extending through so many years.

From the establishment of the Government to the present time the power and duty of the Attorney-General to invoke the aid of the courts in recovering lands assumed to have been erroneously conveyed by the Government has stood unquestioned. As matter of practical administration he acts daily in this direction upon the request of the officers of the Land Department, who are under the law directly charged with the duty of protecting the Government in this regard. But the performance of that duty does not need the incentive of legislation, nor should the will of Congress control the judgment of the highest law officer of the Government in determining the existence or non-existence of a remedy in favor of the United States, nor compel him to institute and carry forward litigation which, in his judgment, can not succeed upon either legal or equitable grounds.

The present bill makes it obligatory upon both the officers of the Land Department to adjust all grants however ancient and the Attorney-General to commence proceedings for recovery regardless of the justice, wisdom, or policy of such proceeding. While all of these grants have been adjusted in whole or in part by the officers of the Land Department, acting in accordance with settled precedent and long-established rules of measurement which the railroads did not inaugurate nor control, this bill seeks to punish the Government's grantees for the assumed mistakes of its own officers, and to put in litigation titles which were obtained without fraud and in accordance with such long-established precedents. Recognizing the existing fact that the lands so conveyed have in large part passed into the hands of innocent purchasers for value, the bill holds out to such purchasers the glittering promise of a new title by gift from the United States after their existing titles have been clouded for many years with litigation and finally set aside. As this promise is a mere gratuity upon the part of the Government, it can be rescinded at any future time. But assuming its integrity for the present, the bill then provides for suits against the railroad companies to recover the Government price per acre for all lands to which its purchasers may receive such gift of title from the Government. The futility of such legislation must be apparent to every legal mind. Upon the recovery of these titles by the Government the purchasers from the railroads stand without legal or equitable remedy against the United States thereon. The assumption of the obligation by the Government to make a new title to such purchasers can not create a legal or equitable obligation from the railroad companies to the Government in turn to recoup to it the value of such lands. The sole responsibility of the railroad companies would be upon the warranty of title, if any, given their purchasers. No obligation to the Government can be created beyond that point by legislation or otherwise.

And, finally, the minority protest that the only result of such legislation as this is to cloud and embarrass the titles of thousands of innocent men who, during the pendency of litigation which this bill directs, will find themselves unable to handle their property by sale, mortgage, or otherwise. The evil results flowing from such condition of affairs, whether of long or short duration, is so great that it manifestly can not justify Congress in thus legislating. It is precisely the case where under the existing circumstances it is far better to stop with ascertaining what the law has been construed to be and what forms of measurement have been adopted through so many years by the officers charged with the administration of these grants and bound by an official oath, than to seek to rescind what has thus been done in order to recover a few thousand acres of land at the end of long and widespread litigation, which must carry in its train all the evils which flow from the general upheaval of real titles in settled communities.

H. S. VAN EATON.
ISAAC STEPHENSON.

Before the conclusion of the reading of the report the hammer fell.

The SPEAKER. The time in opposition to the motion has expired.

Mr. VAN EATON. I ask consent that the remainder of the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say, in conclusion, that so far as the railroads are concerned, for all the purposes of this bill, I care nothing for them. It is the farmer and the settler for whom I speak, believing as I do its only tendency is to unrest and disquiet, to litigation and years of uncertainty concerning the titles of people, of all others, who can least afford the uncertainty, delay, and expense of lawsuits; besides, it is a bill of too much importance to be rushed through the House under suspension of the rules and without opportunity for examination and debate.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes in support of the motion.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I yield that time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to reply to the two points which have been suggested in opposition to this motion by the gentleman from Mississippi: First, that the tendency of this bill will be to unsettle titles as to lands which have been heretofore granted; and in response to that I wish to say that the direct converse of that proposition is the truth, and that the operation of this bill will be to settle instead of unsettle these titles. It does not presume to divest anybody, either a settler or a railway company, of any title to any land. It simply presupposes the fact that these companies entered and have had certified to them lands to which they are not entitled, and the document to which I called the attention of the House a few moments since in the course of my remarks shows that these three railroad companies have already had certified to them 73,351 acres of land in excess of what they were entitled to, which fact was admitted by the railroads themselves and is conceded on all hands. That being the condition of affairs, the question arises, what is to be done in the case? Upon these lands people have gone to settle either in one of two ways; either as purchasers from the railroad company, assuming that these lands having been certified to the railway company belonged to it, and therefore that it had the right to sell; or, second, they have gone upon the land as settlers under the general land laws of the country. As it turns out the railroad company had no right, and the bill protects both classes of settlers and without litigation in any way, by providing that when the readjustment is made the settler whose entry has been canceled or his application denied shall be reinstated in all his rights by being permitted to perfect his entry; or if he shall have purchased from said railroad company prior to the passage of this act, all that is necessary to complete his title is to make proof of the fact at the proper local land office within the time fixed in the act.

But perhaps I should state more explicitly what is meant by this readjustment, as several gentleman around in my immediate vicinity here have asked the question, which I will try to answer to their satisfaction. An adjustment under the public land system is merely the fixing of the definite sections and quarter-sections by the Interior Department to determine what tracts of land the railroad company is entitled to. That is all there is of it—merely determining the specific tracts that the company should have.

The bill, as I have said, provides that where heretofore land has been erroneously certified to a company that was not entitled to it, if a man has bought from the railroad company his title is validated on making proof of that fact. Where is there unsettling of title by that? If a man had made an entry in good faith on the public lands, but by a mistaken construction in the Interior Department his entry was canceled or held for naught, this act provides, in the third section, that the canceled entry shall be reinstated, provided the party has remained in possession down to the present time. There is no unsettling of title, but a validation of title, and with no injury to anybody, and with no expense of litigation, except so far as the Department of Justice shall file a bill to cancel patents, &c., unlawfully issued.

Mr. MILLS. Have these lands been all surveyed?

Mr. PAYSON. They have all been surveyed, but the practice was in the Interior Department to certify en masse, and leave it to the future to determine the amount the company were entitled to and the specific tracts they should have.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate on the bill has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. MORRISON. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 34.

Mr. PERKINS. Count the other side.

The negative vote being taken, there were noes 95.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 214, nays 9, not voting 100; as follows:

YEAS—214.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HANNIBAL, MO.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 7735, which I send to the desk, that the rules be suspended and that the bill be passed with an amendment striking out "five hundred," so that it will read "$37,000."

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to complete the public building in course of erection at Hannibal, Mo., in accordance with the original plans of the Supervising Architect providing for a building three stories high, and to make the same fire-proof, the sum of $37,500 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MORRISON. I demand a second.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 160, noes 6; so a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. There is a second, and under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate; fifteen minutes in support of the motion and fifteen minutes in opposition. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read the letter of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in relation to this building, transmitted to the Speaker of the House by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, March 17, 1886.

SIR: At the request of Hon. W. H. Hatch, I have the honor to call your attention to the advisability of an increased appropriation to complete the public building at Hannibal, Mo. (employing fire-proof construction), to accommodate the post-office, court-house, internal-revenue, and other officers of that place, in accordance with the original plans and specifications.

These plans provided for a building three stories high, photograph of which was published in my last annual report. The design contemplates the completion of the first story for the use and occupation of the Post-Office Department, and the dimensions of which are such as only to properly provide for the handling of the mails received at that place. The second story is required for the use and occupation of the internal-revenue officers of that district. The third story will be required for the use and occupation of United States circuit and district courts, with their necessary officers.

The economy of an increase of $37,500 to construct an additional story at this time is manifest and essential, not only to afford proper accommodations for the officers, but to make the building harmonious in its architectural proportions. The expense of roofing in the third story of the building will be no more than that required for a two-story structure, and the additional accommodations provided justify the recommendation herewith submitted, that the above amount be appropriated so that work can proceed upon the building in its regular order.

Respectfully, yours,

M. E. BELL, Supervising Architect.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, the communication just read was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and by that committee was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The matter has been acted upon by a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and by the full committee, and the chairman informed me this morning that the bill had been approved by the full committee unanimously, as I understand him to say. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. EDEN. Have the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds made a report?

Mr. HATCH. The bill was approved by the full committee this morning. The report has not yet been made, but I state the fact that the committee have approved the bill and recommended its passage.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] to the fact that this letter of the Supervising Architect refers to certain photographs. Is the gentleman prepared to show those photographs to the House? [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] tells us this bill has the approval of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That is the only information we have of the fact. I do not, however, question it. The bill is to be considered without any report, on a motion to suspend the rules. The bill will pass, no doubt, not because of any merit it may have, but because other bills more or less meritorious are behind it and in league with it. In saying in league with it, I mean that these things—these public buildings, so called—naturally go together through this House. Several years ago, when this nice town or little city of Hannibal, Mo., had a population, as the census tells us, of 11,074 (it probably has a good many more now, for I believe it is a very flourishing little place), the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], who is very able in legislation, and especially in all that relates to the management of legislation, secured the passage of a law here to build a house at Hannibal at a limited cost of $75,000. That was understood to be the sum of entire cost, beyond which the Treasury was not to be depleted. So it was fixed by law.

And I am not talking now with any expectation of defeating this bill, but for the purpose of pointing out some of the abuses that go along with the construction of these public buildings. That appropriation, originally $75,000, soon grew to $93,000; just how, the gentleman from Missouri may or may not know; and I undertake to say a close scrutiny would demonstate that that increase was without any public necessity. Now $37,000 more is asked because the Supervising Architect tells us that there is a photograph of the building somewhere [laughter] which shows the building as it ought to be, not as the law provided it should be, but according to some arrangement made by the officials having control of the building, not in accordance with the original provision of law.

This photograph gives information that the building "is required for the use and occupation of United States circuit and district courts with their necessary officers;" and that a thirty-seven-thousand-dollar addition is necessary to hold the court and court or other officials. There is no court at Hannibal. There has been an effort on the part of the Missouri delegation for two, three, or four years to remove a court or a part of the court from where it is now held to Hannibal, but it has not gone there yet. Probably the gentleman who wrote this letter for our information did not know anything about that. He saw the photograph [laughter] and then tells us that it is necessary to have this building $37,000 more expensive for a court-room.

Mr. Speaker, I merely call attention to these things to show how these bills get through this House. I presume this bill is quite as meritorious as many others that are here enacted into laws because they are leagued one with another, a majority of them being without merit to secure favorable consideration but for such combination.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, it is only necessary for me to say that when I introduced a bill in the Forty-seventh Congress to provide for a public building at Hannibal, Mo., it was brought before this House upon its merits, and after a full and fair discussion of it and the presentation of all the facts it passed by a very decided majority. Now an increase in the appropriation is asked for to make this needed public building fire-proof in its construction, worthy of the Government and of the business of the Government at that point. And I wish to say further that I am as far as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] can be from coming to this House and asking for anything in the way of an appropriation that I do not believe is justified by the needs of the public service.

The motion of Mr. HATCH was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

So the rules were suspended; and the bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DES MOINES, IOWA.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill 5251 and pass the same.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill making an appropriation for the repairs and enlargement of the post-office and court-house at Des Moines, Iowa, and fixing a limit therefor.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it in order to move that the House do now adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make that motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the gentleman that this is not quite fair. There ought to be one motion on each side.

Mr. SPRINGER. There has already been one motion on each side.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPRINGER, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 46, noes 97.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That $153,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the repairs and enlargement of the United States post-office and court-house at Des Maines, Iowa; and this amount shall be in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated for said purpose, and shall, together with said sum, be considered the limit of appropriations for such repairs and enlargement.

SEC. 2. That the officers of the United States Government having charge of the erection of public buildings are authorized and required to be governed by this limit in making contracts therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand a second.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 151, noes 12.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Debate is now in order for thirty minutes; fifteen minutes in favor of the motion, and fifteen against it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes an appropriation for a building at Des Moines, the capital of the State of Iowa, in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. CONGER], to whom I yield so much time as he may desire.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, an appropriation for the extension of this building was made some three or four years ago and plans were prepared, but they have not yet been carried out. During this time the city and State have grown so rapidly that in order to accommodate the increasing business it is found necessary that the building should be enlarged. The amount now proposed to be appropriated is asked in order to construct a building of a size sufficient to accommodate the business which must be done there. In the first place, this building must accommodate the post-office, the gross receipts of which are nearly $100,000 a year and the net receipts $67,000, giving a larger percentage of net revenue to the Government than any other post-office in the United States except one, that at the town of Elgin, Ill. The city of Des Moines is practically in the center of the State. It is the commercial and the railroad center of the State, thirteen or fourteen railroads reaching therefrom into every part of our Commonwealth. The whole business of the State practically centers there. Consequently this city is doing the business of a population of nearly 2,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman state what other Government offices, besides the post-office, are to be accommodated in this building?

Mr. CONGER. The other offices to be accommodated are the United States circuit and district courts, the pension agency for the States of Nebraska, Iowa, and Minnesota, the internal-revenue collector's office for that district, and the two United States land offices.

Mr. Speaker, as I am not disposed to detain the House I will not occupy further time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I reserve the balance of my time, simply stating for the information of the House that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have unanimously reported in favor of this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the report of the committee be read in my time.

The report (by Mr. HENLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred House bill 5251, beg leave to report:

By act of May 7, 1882, provision was made for repairing and enlarging the post-office and court-house at Des Moines, Iowa; $45,000 was appropriated to begin the work, and additional appropriations have since been made, making a total for said purpose of $180,000. But the rapid growth of the city and State, and the great increase of public business that must be transacted there, have demonstrated the total inadequacy of the proposed enlargement for the present demand, much less the increased demand which must be provided for in the very near future.

The Government owns the ground, and it will be the part of true economy to extend the building at this time, in anticipation of the growing increase in the public business, and thus prevent another enlargement and rearrangement which must of necessity be made, at great expense, at an early date.

It was thought that the original building would answer the public demand for many years, but after an occupancy of only twelve years a considerable enlargement was found absolutely necessary. The per cent. of increase of both population and business is much greater now than then; hence the demand for more liberal accommodations for the future.

As showing the rapid growth of the city and the marvelous increase of business, the population of the city of Des Moines, Iowa, was, in 1860, 3,965; in 1870, 12,035; in 1880, 22,696; in 1885, 36,494.

Population of State in 1865, 754,699; in 1885, 1,753,980.

Miles of railroad in State in 1865, 1,000; miles of railroad in 1885, 7,000.

Des Moines is the capital, and is the commercial as well as the railroad center of the State. In 1865 the city had but one line of railroad; now thirteen lines radiate from here to every part of the State.

The volume of business in the city for 1885 was $70,796,691. The permanent improvements made during the year were $3,502,416.

It expended, in 1886, for paving, sewering, and other public improvements, $217,963. The State has just completed a capitol building there at the cost of $3,000,000.

The internal revenue collected at Des Moines in 1885 was $1,958,811.60. The total financial transactions of the Des Moines post-office were $1,809,542.57; money-order business, $1,720,923.99; stamps sold, $88,618.

Gross receipts	$93,308 83
Expenses	25,471 29
Net revenue	67,837 54

being a larger per cent. of net revenue than from any other first-class post-office save one in the United States. The pension-office here paid out during 1885, to 17,989 pensioners, $1,958,811.60.

This public building must accommodate the post-office with over forty employés; the pension office with a very large clerical force; the United States courts with their various officers; the collector of internal revenue with necessary attendants, and the register and receiver of the United States land office with their cumbersome records. The space in the old building had proven grossly inadequate and the present plan for enlargement will very illy meet the demands for room.

In consequence of the repairs and extension ordered the offices are now all in rented quarters—none of them fire-proof—all of them very crowded, and for which the Government is paying an annual rental of $6,148.

Des Moines is the largest and most rapidly growing city in the State, and the whole State is tributary to her. Judging from the past, her population will probably reach 75,000 at the end of the next ten years, with the public business increased in proportion. The Government ought, while enlarging this building, to make provisions for this increased business.

The Supervising Architect of the Treasury and the general superintendent of repairs of public buildings both recommend it in their annual report, and the Secretary of the Treasury advises it in a letter here subjoined.

The additional appropriation of $153,000 asked for in this bill should be granted, to the end that safe, convenient, and comfortable accommodations for the transaction of the public business may be furnished to a community who are doing so much for the public improvement and contributing so largely to the public revenue. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 13, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo in relation to extension of limit of cost of public building at Des Moines, Iowa, as proposed by pending bill No. 5251.

The following statement is submitted by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and shows the amount of space which is now occupied by the several officers who are to be located in the building, and the space which can be allowed by the extension to the old building, as proposed in the bill above referred to:

	Space now occupied.	Space allowed by extension.

It will be observed that the extension will afford about one-half more floor space than the officers now occupy in rented buildings; and it is reported that the offices of the clerks of court, the marshal and the jury rooms are much crowded, and the post-office and pension departments are very badly crowded. As the alterations of the present building under the limit of cost heretofore fixed have been commenced, it would seem to be a measure of economy to make the proposed extension of the building large enough not only to afford the additional space, which is now very much needed, but to provide for the future increase of the public business. By this extension the accommodation for the post-office department is increased only from 7,260 feet to 9,080 square feet. The present building has been built about twelve years, and in that short space of time the accommodations afforded have been found entirely inadequate. With the exception of a tower, with clock, which it is estimated will cost $12,240, there is no external ornamentation of note contemplated, as the design must necessarily be made to conform to that of the present building, which is a plain stone structure; that is, the outside walls are faced with limestone.

The estimated cost of the proposed enlargement, including the cost of an elevator, the approaches, and heating apparatus for the entire building, is $155,000, and the limit should be extended from $180,000 to $335,000. The cost of heating apparatus, approaches, and elevator were not included in the original estimate.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. SAMUEL DIBBLE,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call attention to the fact that this building has already cost, according to the report just read, $180,000.

A MEMBER. Suppose it has.

Mr. SPRINGER. When the building was authorized to be constructed it was to cost $135,000; and $40,000 additional has since been appropriated to complete it. We are now asked for another appropriation to complete it—$153,000.

A MEMBER. Making a total of what?

Mr. SPRINGER. A total of about $330,000.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to the gentleman in one moment. I wish to call attention to the fact that, having authorized the construction of a building which was limited to cost $135,000, we are required afterward to more than double that amount in order to complete the building according to plans drawn up in the Treasury Department. There is something wrong about this system. Either we should never begin the construction of a building until the plans have been adopted, estimates made, and the cost ascertained, or else we should leave the whole thing open, the appropriations to be made from time to time according to the caprices of the Architect or the growing demands of those who may be asking for the erection of the building.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, rose. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Illinois has yielded the floor to me to ask him a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman from Illinois mean to say the original plan for which the first appropriation was made is the same plan which now calls for $300,000?

Mr. SPRINGER. No; I did not say that. I said we first appropriated $135,000 to complete the building; that we afterward appropriated $40,000 in addition to complete the building, and now it is not completed, and we are asked for $153,000 more to make the building complete. After we have spent this much money on it we have no assurance in the report or anywhere else we will not be asked for still further appropriation to complete this building, so that it may amount to $500,000 before it is completed.

I now reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I yield to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] for three minutes.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I do not want so much time. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois that the original plan, in the opinion of the present Secretary of the Treasury as well as the Architect, is wholly inadequate to meet the rising and growing wants of that city of Des Moines. So that this plan has not only the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury but of the Architect of the Treasury, and also the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There is no city in the Northwest growing with more rapidity than the city of Des Moines.

Mr. STRUBLE. Except Sioux City, Iowa.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And no city in which perhaps the net revenue is so great, in proportion to the expense of its collection, as in Des Moines. We want that building, and ought to have it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I yield now for two minutes to my colleague [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL. The plans under which the present building was constructed involved an expenditure of $160,000, which was obtained by two separate appropriations. A third appropriation, and the one under which improvements and repairs are now being constructed, amounted to some $50,000, making the amount referred to by the gentleman from Illinois. In the process of completing these repairs the building is now practically dismantled, so that it is scarcely capable of being used for more than one or two offices.

A MEMBER. It is not in use at all.

Mr. HALL. It was while the building was in this condition, while the Architect was proceeding to restore it, the necessity for its enlargement presented itself and that the business there required it. The business of the post-office has increased at a greater percentage than any other post-office in the United States. So, too, in reference to the business of the courts held there. The Architect began an investigation to ascertain what should be done to meet the actual necessities.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, there is more mail matter handled at Des Moines, containing a population of 36,000, than in any other city in this country inferior to Chicago. As has been explained, this building is necessary to accommodate the two United States courts, district and circuit, as well as the post-office, the land office, which contains large and voluminous records extending for fifty years and including all the land records of the State of Iowa, and the collector of internal revenue. Indeed there is not a more meritorious bill, or one for which there is greater necessity, than this one providing for the enlargement of the public building at Des Moines, Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I now ask for a vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has remaining three minutes.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said in behalf of this public building, but I am not in favor of allowing the increased amount asked for. As I understand this bill, they are now asking for $153,000 more. In the first place $135,000 was asked for this public building, and then $45,000 more, and now we are asked for $53,000 more.

It seems to me if the Government ought to furnish money to construct public buildings we ought to know in the beginning the amount intended for that purpose. As we are going along we ought to know how we are expending the public money. For one, I am for an economical administration of the Government. I find by examination this House has already appropriated, under the head of general bills, $141,000,000.

Mr. WILKINS. Including the appropriation bills?

Mr. MCCREARY. Yes; this House has already passed bills under the head of general appropriation bills amounting to $141,000,000. We have also appropriated $92,580 for private pensions. For public buildings we have allowed the sum of $1,884,525; we have already voted away $664,750 for the construction of light-houses and light-ships; we have voted away $550,656 to private claims; and under the head of miscellaneous expenditures we have appropriated $69,431. That, Mr. Speaker, is the record we are making at this session. We have already gone in the neighborhood of $150,000,000 this session.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. How many public buildings has Kentucky asked for?

Mr. MCCREARY. I desire to make this statement in answer to the gentleman from Iowa, that the district I have the honor to represent upon this floor has never asked a dollar for a public building.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But you are for a subtreasury at Louisville, I presume.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate under the rule has expired.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. COWLES. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered—13 members only voting therefor.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, the House divided; and there were—ayes 128, noes 18.

Mr. EDEN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. EDEN and Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 144, noes 18.

Mr. EDEN. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So, no further count being demanded (two-thirds voting in favor thereof), the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, each side seems to have had its share, and I move that the house do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 73, noes 75.

Mr. RANDALL. Since the vote is so close, with a view to find out when we may be allowed to adjourn I ask the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 33 members in support of and 93 in opposition to the demand.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 67, nays 105, not voting 151; as follows:

Mr. HANBACK with Mr. SNYDER.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, with Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. ATKINSON.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. FUNSTON.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments by the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT EL PASO, TEX.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the rules be suspended, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6665) for the erection of a public building at El Paso, Tex., and that the same be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the United States custom-house, post-office, and Federal courts, and for other Government uses, at El Paso, in the State of Texas. The site, and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $150,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $150,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Texas shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. COWLES. I demand a second.

Mr. McCOMAS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LANHAM. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANHAM. If the House should now adjourn would I be recognized next suspension day?

The SPEAKER. On the next individual suspension day this bill would come up the first thing as the unfinished business under the rule.

The question being taken on the motion that the House adjourn, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; the affirmative vote being 19—not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. COWLES. I insist on the vote being by tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 128, no 1.

Mr. COWLES. No quorum.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. LANHAM. I hope that motion will not be insisted upon. It is manifest there is not a quorum here. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw the motion for a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 4, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OHIO SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HOAR. I have received a letter from the secretary of the investigating committee of the house of representatives of the State of Ohio, calling attention to the fact that in printing the testimony laid before the Senate the other day forwarded by the house of representatives of the State of Ohio there was added some matter which did not belong to it. The letter is in the nature of a petition, though it is addressed to me. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Upon examining the Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 106, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, we find upon page 288 certain matter which was not included in the papers forwarded by the house of representatives of Ohio to the United States Senate.

This is a surreptitious interpolation or addendum, intended no doubt to reflect upon the good faith of the majority of the Ohio house committee, and mislead your committee.

We have examined the copy sent to the Superintendent of Public Printing, and find that the addendum complained of is written with pencil on soft paper and wholly disconnected with the official papers.

We respectfully call your attention to this matter, and trust that such inquiry may be instituted as will uncover the perpetrator of this falsification of a public record.

Very respectfully,

EMMETT TOMKINS,
Secretary of Ohio House Committee.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR,
Chairman Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the document referred to be ordered not to be further distributed, and that it be reprinted under the direction of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I will state that if the order is adopted I will show to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] the matter and learn from him whether it is properly a part of the document as he understands it. There will be no difficulty about it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the paper be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that that committee be directed to recall the document already printed and print it anew. If there be no objection that order will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRISON. I present the petition of E. C. Newland Post, No. 247, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill pertaining to pensions, known as the bill recommended by the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic. Some of the features of the recommendations of the committee referred to have been adopted by the Committee on Pensions in the bill which has been reported and is now upon the Calendar. Other features I think have not been acted upon, and I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. I present the petition of Lena Dolsen Parsons and 6 other citizens of Ypsilanti, Mich., praying for appropriate legislation for the protection of young girls in the District of Columbia and other localities within the jurisdiction of the United States. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such petitions have been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PALMER. But this petition refers to the District of Columbia and other localities under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. FRYE. My impression is that all memorials of that kind have gone to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have presented two or three.

Mr. PALMER. It is immaterial to me to which committee it is referred, but the reference I suggested seemed to be the appropriate one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been the usual course to refer similar petitions to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The petition will be so referred, if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of the Memphis (Tenn.) Merchants' Exchange, praying for the repeal of the tax on traveling salesmen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of citizens of Meriden and New Haven, in the State of Connecticut, praying for legislation increasing the powers of the National Board of Health; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. PLATT. I present resolutions of the New Haven Colony Historical Society, relating to the efforts of Mr. B. F. Stevens, of London, to obtain the aid of the United States in copying and publishing documents of importance relating to the history of the States between 1772 and 1784. I move the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of certain bills on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims. Is there objection?

WILLIAM ERVIN.

The bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William Ervin, his heirs or assigns, $7,650, being the value of one hundred and eighty head of beef-cattle seized unlawfully and taken out of his possession, in the State of Kansas, in 1862, by order of Col. Charles R. Jennison, commanding the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry, United States Volunteers, the beef-cattle having been used as subsistence for the officers and soldiers of the regiment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE March 3, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin, having considered the same, report as follows:

The Senate Committee on Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress examined this claim and reported it favorably. Your committee adopt that report, annexing hereto a copy, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

[Senate Report No. 682, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1025) for the relief of William Ervin, having considered the same, beg leave to make the following report:

In the year 1862 the claimant was a resident of Kansas and the owner of 180 head of cattle, which were pasturing near Emporia. About April 15, 1862, the said cattle were taken from the claimant by the order of Col. Charles R. Jennison, commanding the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry, and used by said regiment for food.

This appears from the sworn statement of the claimant himself, and the affidavits of Col. Charles R. Jennison and First Lieut. John A. Tanner. Colonel Jennison says the regiment was in want of beef, and he ordered the seizure of the claimant's cattle, and the same were used for the subsistence of his officers and men, and he did not pay for them. Lieutenant Tanner swears the cattle were taken by the command of Colonel Jennison, and were used for the subsistence of the regiment.

Charles F. Garrett and James S. Emery, residents of the city of Lawrence, Kans., swear they were well acquainted with the claimant from 1857 to 1866, and during that time they knew he was thoroughly loyal to the United States Government.

James Angus swears he was employed by the claimant in the month of April, 1862, herding 180 head of cattle, and that about the 15th day of April the said cattle were taken from the possession of the claimant by the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry. Furthermore that he has a distinct recollection that a few days prior Saint Louis cattle-dealers offered the claimant $42.50 a head for these cattle, but the claimant declined to sell them at that price.

The claimant himself swears to receiving the same offer, but that he declined because he considered them worth $55 a head.

In explanation of the long delay in presenting his claim to Congress the claimant swears that in the year 1867 he placed his claim in the hands of a Mr. L. M. O'Brien for prosecution, who, being unable to attend to it, turned it over to Chipman & Hosmer, claim agents in Washington, D. C., together with a number of affidavits of persons who knew of the taking of the cattle. Chipman & Hosmer told the claimant he must furnish the statements of some officers in command of the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry relative to taking his cattle. The claimant was unable to find officers who had knowledge of the transaction until last year, when he procured the affidavits above mentioned of Colonel Jennison and Lieutenant Tanner. For the lack of such evidence, Chipman & Hosmer did not present and prosecute the claim.

A letter from Chipman & Hosmer, dated April 30, 1867, acknowledges the receipt of the claim and accompanying papers.

The claimant holds no receipts from Colonel Jennison or any of his command for the cattle, but from records in the War Department it appears that the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry were careless and reckless, accustomed to appropriate property of both friend and foe to their own use, rarely, if ever, giving vouchers therefor. Many complaints were entered against them by different generals who commanded the divisions in which they were, and finally Colonel Jennison was obliged to leave the service on account of his unsoldierly conduct.

For the above reasons your committee attach less importance to the want of vouchers.

Your committee think the claim is fully substantiated by the evidence, and that the amount offered for the cattle by the Saint Louis cattle-dealers—$42.50 per head—just prior to their seizure, is a fair price.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if this is the first time that this claim has been presented in Congress.

Mr. PIKE. No; it was presented and passed the Senate at the last Congress; and it was reported favorably by the committee of the other House but failed in that body for want of time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was last year the first time it was presented?

Mr. PIKE. I think not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has there ever been any adverse report upon the claim?

Mr. PIKE. Never to my knowledge.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

P. L. WARD.

The bill (S. 1150) for the relief of P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to P. L. Ward, executrix of William Ward, deceased, of Norfolk, Va., $2,075.13, in full satisfaction of all claim for beef and vegetables furnished by William Ward to the United States Navy, and in full satisfaction for hay sold to the quartermaster of the United States Army.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, submitted by Mr. PIKE March 10, 1886, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1150) for the relief of P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased, beg leave to offer the following report:

Bills for the same claim as the present one passed the Senate at the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses, but each time failed of consideration in the House.

At the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress Senator HARRIS, for the Committee on Claims, made a report on this claim which embodied clearly and fully all the facts in the case.

The Committee on Claims of the Forty-seventh Congress, and again of the Forty-eighth Congress, adopted that report.

Your committee adopt the same report, annexing hereto a copy, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the whole report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first part of the report has been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report appended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report referred to will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Senate Report No. 428, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 879) for the relief of P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased, have examined the same, and report thereon as follows:

This claim was presented to the Senate during the Forty-sixth Congress by the petition of said executrix, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and assigned to Mr. HARRIS, a member of the committee, for examination and report.

On the 11th day of February, 1880, the claim was favorably reported to the Senate by Mr. HARRIS. The following is a copy of the report:

The petition states that petitioner is the widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased. That in June, 1860, William Ward entered into a written contract with the United States for supplying fresh beef and vegetables to the Navy, at the Norfolk, Va., station, and that under said contract her late husband and testator, on or about the 21st of January, 1861, supplied the United States ship Plymouth with the articles named to the amount of $275.13, for which no payment was ever made, and she refers to the records of the Navy Department for the proof. The committee sent the petition to the Navy Department with a request for such information in respect to this claim as the records of that Department could furnish, and received from the Secretary the following reply:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 5, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the petition of Mrs. P. L. Ward, asking for payment of $275.13, on account of fresh beef and vegetables supplied by her late husband, William Ward, of Norfolk, Va., for the use of the United States Navy, which petition was referred to this Department by the honorable Secretary of War, in compliance with you request of the 15th ultimo.

The account of the late Mr. Ward is correct as shown by the records of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing in this Department, with the exception that the fresh beef and vegetables referred to were delivered to the United States steamer Brooklyn instead of the United States steamer Plymouth, as stated in the petition.

Very respectfully,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. I. G. HARRIS,
United States Senate.

From which the committee is satisfied that the articles were furnished under contract as stated in the petition, and have never been paid for, and that the amount, $275.13, is justly due the claimant and should be paid.

The petitioner also states that in the month of August, 1863, her testator entered into a verbal contract with Capt. Edwin Ludlow, of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, in the presence of the Hon. L. H. Chandler, United States attorney for that district, and one other witness, for the purchase of sixty tons of hay, at $30 per ton, which was delivered by her said testator to the said Ludlow and used by the Army of the United States. That shortly after the delivery said Ludlow left that locality without paying for the hay, though often having promised so to do.

On the 12th December, 1866, her late husband and testator addressed a letter to the Quartermaster-General asking payment for this hay so furnished, reciting the facts of the contract and delivery of the hay, and the fact that no voucher was given, because Captain Ludlow said it was not necessary to give a voucher, as he would pay for the hay as soon as he received funds, which he was daily expecting; but he left there without paying, and without giving any voucher for the 60 tons of hay, and that upon diligent inquiry he had never been able to ascertain the residence of Captain Ludlow since that time.

This letter is indorsed on the back as follows:

"I most unhesitatingly indorse the within statement.

"L. H. CHANDLER,
"United States District Attorney for Virginia.
"J. T. DANIELS."

On the 16th of January, 1867, this account was made out upon the regular printed form furnished by the Department, upon which the sale, delivery, and value of the hay, amounting to $1,800, and the loyalty of the claimant are proved by the affidavits of the then claimants, William Ward, L. H. Chandler, and J. R. Hunter; and the respectability and loyalty of the said Ward, Chandler, and Hunter are respectively certified to by John E. Doyle, justice of the peace; and the respectability and loyalty of William Ward is also certified to by William W. Wing, postmaster.

The oath of allegiance to the United States of William Ward is also exhibited, and Henry M. Bowden, clerk of the corporation court, certifies to the citizenship, respectability, and loyalty of William Ward, and to the official character of John E. Doyle, as a justice of the peace for said county.

The letter above referred to, addressed by William Ward to the Quartermaster-General, and the proof above referred to were sent to the committee by the War Department in answer to a letter from the committee asking for such information as the records of that Department could furnish as to the justice of this claim. The following is the letter from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 30, 1880.

SIR: Acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, referring for information memorial of Mrs. P. L. Ward for pay for certain quartermaster stores and beef delivered by her deceased husband, William Ward, in 1860 and 1863 to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army and the naval station at Norfolk, Va., respectively, I have the honor in reply to inclose herewith a letter from Mr. Ward, dated December 12, 1866, submitting his claim to the Quartermaster-General, paper which contains all the information on the subject the records of this Department afford.

No action was taken upon the claim by the Quartermaster-General for the reason that it originated in Virginia, a State declared to be in insurrection during the rebellion.

Your letter and the memorial have been referred, as desired, to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, for information from his Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEX. RAMSEY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Committee on Claims, United States Senate.

The Quartermaster-General takes no action upon this claim upon no other than the cold, technical ground that the claimant was a resident of a State declared to be in rebellion.

The proof is clear and conclusive that Quartermaster Ludlow contracted for this hay, equally clear as to the contract price, amounting to $1,800, equally clear as to the loyalty to the United States of William Ward, who furnished the hay, and who was the husband and is the testator of the petitioner, and equally clear that the hay has never been paid for.

It does not clearly appear when William Ward died. It is certain that it was subsequent to 1867 and before 1878, when this petition was presented by P. L. Ward, widow and executrix. She states that neither her late husband nor herself were ever informed nor did they know of the establishment of what is called the Southern Claims Commission, nor the necessity of presenting this claim to that tribunal, until after the expiration of the time within which it could have been presented; nor did petitioner know of the status of the claim until a few months before the presentation of this petition.

The committee are satisfied that the vegetables and beef, amounting to $275.15, were delivered under contract to the United States Navy; and the sixty tons of hay were sold and delivered to Quartermaster Ludlow, at $30, amounting to $1,800, making an aggregate of $2,075.13; that the same were never paid for, and that the claimant was loyal to the United States, and that this sum is justly due to the claimant and should be paid; and therefore the committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend that it pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is somewhat strange that we have no information as to what has become of the quartermaster, Ludlow, who is said to have bought this large amount of hay at $30 a ton. He was an officer of the Government, and certainly could be traced to his death or departure from the service, or something.

We have in this report apparently, as I have run over it hastily, nothing at all from any officer of the Government, but only the affidavits and statements of the claimants and their friends. It does seem to me that the committee ought in such a case to look a little for evidence from the other side of the contract when that contract is said to have been with a named officer of the Government who was known. The report does not state that this officer has been sought for, that he is dead, or anything whatever about him except the fact that it is proved by the claimant that he received this property at a price and used it for the United States, and so on.

This was twenty years ago and more. All this time there has been no application to Congress until recently, apparently; there is no statement of any. For eight or ten years during this time Congress provided a tribunal by a public law which everybody was bound to know and which almost every person interested in claims did know, which required that every person who came before that tribunal with his evidence should be heard, and that counsel representing the United States should be heard on the other side, and evidence procured if it seemed to be necessary or desirable, in order that just claims might be paid and that unjust and fraudulent ones might be excluded. That was the Southern Claims Commission.

It appears from the report of the committee that this claim fell within that category. Now, the United States by the non-presentation of that claim has been deprived of the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses and of producing Captain Ludlow, who is said to have bought this property. I say nothing about the little Navy affair, which I can not quite understand myself. The committee say nothing about what has become of Ludlow, and the whole thing is entirely ex parte.

If we proceed with this sort of business, there is no claim not presented to the commission which will be excluded; and there are millions upon millions of them which were not presented for the reason that the owners of the claims believed that it would be a fruitless thing to do so, either because the claims were fictitious in fact or did not fall within that class of cases which the public Treasury ought to pay for, or because the claimants, or some of them, were enemies of the United States at the time the supposed claim arose. If we proceed in this way those claimants can come forward after twenty years and by ex parte affidavits prove their loyalty, for everybody is loyal now, and most people are willing to believe, even as it appeared in the Southern Claims Commission, that they were loyal then, when there was any money in it. And so the whole value of the protection to the United States of the organization of that commission, before whom everybody was required to go and which continued from year to year, and was extended from year to year in order that everybody might have justice and fair play, is to be entirely lost, and there will be brought before us any amount of the millions of such claims as this, perhaps not as good, if we go behind the operations of that commission and hold that it is just as well for parties to come now and say, "We did not know of the commission," or "we were unable to procure our evidence," or "we were too poor to prosecute," or whatever the reason might be, by ex parte affidavits submitted to a committee to prove loyalty, prove the delivery of property, not calling up the officers who received it or accounting for their absence, and put them through.

Now, I do not believe, with great respect to these claimants whoever they are, that that is good policy; and I should be glad to have this matter lie over until I can write to the Department and find out what has become of Captain Ludlow for one thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I object to it for the time being.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the bill. I think it should be disposed of by the Senate, if they are satisfied it is right, during the presence of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These bills are taken up under the eighth rule and are subject to objection.

Mr. HOAR. But I understand that under the eighth rule a motion is in order to proceed to the consideration of a bill that is objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion is in order notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the question is taken I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. HOAR. I should like unanimous consent to answer the question and to make a brief statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order pending the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the unanimous consent of the Chair that I may answer the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked——

Mr. LOGAN. My question is whether the committee sent to the Quartermaster's Department to ascertain from the property-rolls and from the rolls kept by the quartermaster at that time in reference to his business whether when this property was taken by the quartermaster by contract, as it is stated, he gave vouchers; for I know of no rule in the Quartermaster's Department or under any greater authority where the quartermaster takes property by contract or agreement that he is not required to give a certificate to that effect, or what is called a voucher.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At that time the law required that every such contract should be in writing.

Mr. LOGAN. The law does require it, and did then, and always has. That is the law, and if the quartermaster did as is stated he certainly gave vouchers to this man if the property was taken or contracted for in any way whatever, and the records of the Quartermaster's Department will show that fact.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to call attention a little further——

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator wanted an answer to the question.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. The committee did apply——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the debate at least for a long enough time to ask the consent of the Senate whether the debate shall proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to interrupt the Chair to state that the Chair asked the consent of the Senate and leave was granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Chair could put the question to the Senate he was interrupted. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the consent of the Senate to proceed with the discussion. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not if we can have an opportunity to be heard in reply.

Mr. HOAR. The honorable Senator from Vermont made his speech and then made a suggestion which took the matter out of the power of anybody to reply except by unanimous consent. I should not undertake to make that return and to ask a unanimous consent which would not give him or anybody an opportunity to reply, I quite assure the Senator, from my style of debate. The Senator from Illinois asked a question, which I desire to answer.

The committee did apply to the Secretary of War for all the information that the records of that Department afforded, and the Secretary of War replied that the letter of Mr. Ward, which he inclosed, contained all the information which the records of that Department showed. I refer to the letter of Alexander Ramsey, dated January 30, 1880. He also referred so much of the claim as related to the stores furnished the naval vessel to the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy reported that the records of the Navy Department established the claim; so that that part of the claim is established by the records of the Navy Department.

The contract for the hay was established by several witnesses living, including the then United States district attorney for Virginia, who not only gave a certificate as to the value of the claim, indorsing it, but testified that the transaction occurred in his presence, and there are several other witnesses who satisfied the committee of the truth of the claim, and that this was a debt which has been due and never has been paid.

Then, in regard to the point that this was not presented to the Southern Claims Commission, it appears that the man died and left this widow some time subsequent to 1867 and before 1869, and she makes her affidavit that her husband and she were ignorant of the Southern Claims Commission arrangement.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, as a further answer to the question raised by the Senator from Illinois, to state that the report shows that no voucher was given by Ludlow for the reason that at the time of the verbal contract Mr. Ludlow said he was expecting to receive funds daily, and would immediately pay for the hay upon the receipt of the funds; but before receiving them, or certainly before payment, he was ordered away from that station and disappeared without giving the voucher and without making the payment.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President, that does not clear it up either. There must be some rule, and especially when the law establishes a rule, by which we can ascertain facts. It is well known by every one who understands military matters—and the Senator from Tennessee certainly does—that every quartermaster, commissary, or other disbursing officer or officer authorized to purchase property for the uses of the Army, is required—not only instructed but required by law—to give vouchers if he does not pay the money, and if he pays the money to take a receipt for it. That is the law. Not only that, but such officers are required to make returns to the Quartermaster's Department or the Commissary Department for all these matters. My point was whether or not the Quartermaster's Department had been inquired of in reference to the purchase of this property, because the rolls of this quartermaster will show the fact that this thing occurred, if it did occur.

Mr. HOAR. We so understood. The committee understood that this was a case where the proper voucher failed to be given, for the reason stated by the Senator from Tennessee, and that the inquiry to the Secretary of War and his answer about the records of that Department cover the case, because of course there could be no other record except in the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator does not exactly understand me. Allow me to explain. I hope I may be pardoned for saying that I was once a quartermaster. I hope that is not offensive here in the Senate. For that reason I know something about the rule in regard to taking up property on the rolls. I merely state that fact to illustrate the question that I asked.

Every quartermaster is required not only to keep a roll of his employés, of his property, of everything that he receives from any other quartermaster, even down to the days when oxen were used instead of mules, when the bows and everything he had to receipt for and keep on what is called his property-roll. Every piece of property taken either by a quartermaster or a commissary for which payment has to be made by the Government has to be kept exactly in the same way.

If this property was taken and not paid for the roll of the quartermaster will show it, and that is the place to apply for it; and the idea of passing such claims here unless the rolls are examined to ascertain the facts whether or not the property was paid for is going into a business that is rather loose.

I have no objection to this man's claim if it is just. It is not that, but it is the ascertainment of the justice of the claim that I am looking to.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. It comes to a very narrow point. I do not want to interrupt him, but I wish to say that the Committee on Claims examine these matters with very great care.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not doubt that.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate never hear of probably twenty, certainly ten, cases decided adversely by the committee where they hear of one reported favorably. I think I may express the entire opinion of that committee that nobody upon the committee objects in the least to scrutiny of the character which the Senator from Illinois makes and which he suggests, because we are exceedingly anxious of course not to be the vehicle of imposition upon the Government and not to be imposed upon ourselves. There is no member of the committee that ever heard of this man before, or probably ever will hear of him again. I certainly never heard of him till the case arose. Therefore every Senator who suggests a fair objection or question or direction or inquiry does a favor to the committee.

My complaint the other day was not directed at all to that sort of discussion in the Senate. My complaint was of the discussion which we hear sometimes from Senators who, without looking into or even reading a report, catch up some fact and object or take some point that can not stand. If there is any mistake about the fact that an application to the Secretary of War for the information which his Department possesses about a claim, and an answer that the records of his Department show nothing but a certain thing, does not cover the Quartermaster's Department in the practice, I think the point of the Senator from Illinois is a good one, and the committee should make a special direction in regard to that. I supposed though, and I think the committee all supposed, that when we addressed the head of the War Department we should get whatever was there. We do not address the subordinates; we address the head of the Department; and he makes his references to the proper subordinates, and his answer is based on the information which comes from the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. LOGAN.. That may be in certain cases, and that would be sufficient. The Quartermaster's Department is a part of the War Department; it is a bureau of the War Department just as much as the Adjutant-General's Department is a bureau of the War Department. They are all bureaus of the War Department. Now, in order to ascertain the fact there is nothing in the Adjutant General's Department in reference to this except letters. For instance, the letter of the Secretary of War making an inquiry from one of the bureaus of the Department goes on file. That letter is there. The information he receives goes on file, and that letter is there; and that is all there is in that Department. But in order to ascertain these facts correctly, the inquiry should be addressed to the Quartermaster's Department. You inquire to have the papers of the quartermaster who is named in the report examined in reference to this specific thing, giving the date, and then the examination is easily made. Then the letter of the Quartermaster-General to the Adjutant-General and to your committee will give you the information you desire in reference to this property. That is the only way you can get at it.

As I said, I do not make objection to the claim, because if the claim is just it ought to be paid; but we are paying claims, and I could suggest the name of a claim that we paid three times in Congress, and finally it was discovered by sending it to one of the Auditors. The Secretary of the Treasury was asked, and knew nothing about it. Finally the Auditor's attention was directed specially to the particular claim, and it was ascertained that it had been paid about forty years before and at three different times, amounting to a good deal of money. A report was made to the Senate about it by Senator Morrill, of Maine, now deceased, a very able and amiable gentleman.

I will state another case without giving the name, for I do not wish to call special attention to it. It has not been very many years ago, however, since a claim was made for an animal, and the account that was given of the claim specified a certain county in a certain State where the animal lost its life. The claim was once paid; but it was before Congress again, and Congress acted favorably. The attention of the Auditor was called to that particular claim, and when he came to examine for the county he found that the State described in which this county should be contained had no such county. He transferred his examination to another State, being an adjacent State, and found that a county of that name did exist in the adjoining State; and when he had the proper county he found that the claim had been paid. That has not been very long ago.

These things are going on all the while. I merely make these suggestions so that we shall have an examination that will convince us that these claims are not fraudulent, and if they are just that they have not been paid. That point sometimes occurs. I do not wish to be captious about these things, but I suggest these propositions that proper examination may be made.

Mr. HOAR. The course of the Committee on Claims is in the first place to get the entire Congressional history of every claim, to have that carefully examined by the clerk, and that is sent to the member of the committee who examines the claim. Then the clerk is directed to write a communication to the proper Department of the Government, sending a statement that there is such a claim, sending a copy of the bill or petition, whatever is the origin of the claim, and asking what information that Department possesses on the subject. There a full examination of the records is made, and sometimes weeks or months expire before the return comes. Whenever we make such a submission to the Secretary of War I think I can affirm from my experience upon the committee that ordinarily everything that the Adjutant-General's Office shows, everything that the Quartermaster-General's Office shows, everything that the accounts of the particular officer who is concerned show, is examined by the Secretary of War, and almost always his letter is accompanied by the reports of his subordinates.

Then the particular member of the committee reports on the claim, and there are gentlemen on that committee who need not be named, but who are quite as vigilant to see that no possible claim gets through that is not well founded—of course some may get through the committee—as any gentleman on the floor. They do it under the responsibility of trying to understand the facts.

Of course if the Senator from Illinois thinks that a letter addressed to the Secretary of War, and a reply which gives us what his records show is not enough for the Senate to proceed on with safety, that there ought to be a specific inquiry about the accounts of this officer and the Quartermaster-General, with his great experience in military accounts, I withdraw my motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I did state that that was the correct way to get at it. I do think so, and I do not think you can get at it in any correct way otherwise.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw my motion, and we can ascertain whether the thing has been settled. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew it, and ask leave to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent of the Senate to reply. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want, while this matter is up, to put in a humble and respectful petition to the Committee on Claims and to my friend from Massachusetts, while they are asking the Quartermaster-General whether the rolls of Captain Ludlow of property taken up at Norfolk just after its capture, in 1863, for hay for the subsistence of the Army show that that hay went on to his rolls as property taken up for the use of the Government, no matter whether he gave a receipt for it or not, to also ask the Secretary of War to inform him, if he can, what has become of Captain Ludlow, to whom no reference is made in these papers and in the report of the committee, which states all, I suppose, that the committee found to exist, all the evidence that the papers show. He could certainly, if he is alive and remembers it, give us some information upon this subject.

I must say it is extremely strange that when the Government through an officer that is named is said to have taken up property for which he did not give a receipt, and which his oath bound him to put onto his rolls and to report to the Quartermaster-General's Office, being property to be accounted for to the United States, he is not even inquired for to ascertain what has become of him and hear what he has to say about it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me for saying that I have no more doubt that that was done than I have that the Senator is now standing on his feet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be so; but I take it that the report of the committee, which is all that we poor other Senators have to go upon, states all there is about it that is supposed to be worth knowing. I hope it has been done, and if it has been I am sorry the committee did not cause search to be made for Ludlow, and if he was dead that search was not made in the rolls of the Quartermaster's Office to show whether Captain Ludlow's papers at Norfolk disclosed that he had taken up 30 tons of hay at or about that time.

It must be remembered that Norfolk in 1863 had been then very recently a somewhat warm spot in the rebellion, and that a considerable number of persons at Norfolk, as well as Washington and elsewhere, were friends of the confederacy and not of the United States, and those people might have had hay; and now after twenty years all the evidence we have got of the loyalty of Ward is the ex parte affidavits of other people, very likely true, but perhaps not. The Southern Claims Commission could have found the matter out, and they did not get a chance to examine it.

But that is not my point now; my only point now is, as the matter is to go over by grace, that the committee will kindly find out, with the other things, what has become of Captain Ludlow.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to considering the bill, the Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to be heard.

Mr. HARRIS. I should hardly feel inclined to do it but for the fact that the report is one that I made and that was adopted by the committee at one time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to say that when I addressed a letter to the Navy Department for such information as that Department could give in respect to the supplies furnished to it, and a similar letter to the War Department for such information as that Department could give in respect to the supplies furnished to that Department, and received the answers from each of those Departments, I confess that as a member of the committee I did not feel called upon to hunt up each and all the subordinates of those Departments to examine or cross-examine them as to the amount of information they may have had. It was fair, as I thought, to presume, and I did presume, that when the War Department answered it answered in good faith, and gave the full extent of the information that it was called on to give in respect to the question. Being unable to give all the information in respect to the item of hay, I was content as a member of the committee with the testimony, of several witnesses, among whom was the district attorney, of residence in the very town, to every material fact connected with the case; and this, as the report shows, upon the testimony.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent for leave to say a word, being a member of the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to say a word. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, the discussion this morning shows the utter impracticability of disposing of these claims by special acts of Congress; it shows the necessity for some general legislation providing a tribunal to which these claims may be presented, and which can adjudicate and determine them. Early in the session I introduced resolutions which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, directing that committee to inquire and report in what cases the Government ought to be held liable for the acts and misconduct of its agents, and if they found that in any case the Government ought to be so held liable to report a law which would authorize suit to be brought by claimants in some court of competent jurisdiction. Nothing has been heard from those resolutions, no report has been made by the committee, and so far as I am informed no investigation of the subject has been had.

There are pending to-day and in the Senate Committee on Claims probably four or five hundred bills for special relief. Before this Congress closes there will be seven or eight hundred such bills. There will be examined and reported upon probably three or four hundred claims. Out of those three or four hundred, fifty favorable reports and three hundred and fifty adverse reports may be made; and when the favorable reports come up for consideration in the Senate each will provoke just such a discussion as has taken place this morning, and the Senate will not be satisfied to take the report of the Committee on Claims. Then the few favorable reports that are made by that committee will be criticised and the committee will be found fault with because they have not in the judgment of some Senators examined the cases sufficiently.

Now I undertake to say that it is utterly impossible for any committee of Congress to examine that number of claims and do them justice. The testimony on which they are examined is necessarily ex parte. There are claims here presented for the first time through honorable Senators that originated forty, fifty, or seventy-five years ago; there are claims which have never heretofore been presented to any tribunal. There are other claims presented that were presented to the Southern Claims Commission and rejected on account of the want of loyalty of the claimant, or because the facts were not proved. There are other large claims presented here that have been presented to the War Department and rejected by that Department because the loyalty of the claimant was not proven, or because facts were not sufficiently proven. There are claims here which have been reported adversely from one branch of Congress or the other, or from both, year after year for the last quarter of a century, still fresh, never dying; and the Committee on Claims are expected to re-examine them all and to secure witnesses for the Government, without any proper provision for doing it, and to report them to this body.

In my judgment it was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that Congress should be a great court of claims to which everybody having an imaginable claim that has originated since the foundation of the Government, no matter how often presented to Congress and rejected, or for what cause rejected, should be at liberty to come to Congress after Congress and present his claim and require that it should be re-examined by a committee; and I do hope that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and the Judiciary Committee will take into serious consideration the question whether or not there ought not to be some general legislation providing for the investigation of these claims by a judicial tribunal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him now?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One reason why I should be certainly glad to consider the question if we could find the time, would be to see if, having acted as proposed, like establishing the Court of Claims and the Southern Claims Commission, and given ample jurisdiction and allowed a long time, we should permit everybody who failed there, either because he does not dare to go or does not go, or fails because he does go, to come right around to Congress again, and the Committee on Claims would be asked to try them all over again.

Mr. DOLPH. The court established should be a continuous court. Its judgments should be final and conclusive, and should be treated as final by Congress, but at present there is no statute of limitations against the presentation of claims to Congress. It is provided by the Senate rules that if there is an adverse report, and a claim is rejected, there shall be additional testimony filed before the claim is re-examined. I do not know how well it is enforced by the Secretary of the Senate, but I know it requires a mere suggestion, an additional affidavit of the claimant, although it may contain no additional fact, to comply with the rule, and all the old familiar cases that have been rejected session after session come back regularly to the Committee on Claims, to whom they are all referred. The Senators who have introduced bills for the payment of these claims urge members of the committee to take them up and report them. Even if an adverse report is made, the bill is placed on the docket if the Senator introducing the bill happens to notice when it is reported adversely, and is frequently rereferred to the committee, and invariably introduced again at the next session; it never dies. Whenever an adverse report is made, and a suggestion is made in the report that the proof is weak upon some point, the next session there is additional proof upon that point by ex parte affidavits made concerning transactions often long past.

The whole system is faulty; the whole thing should be abolished. There should be a tribunal established by law with well-defined jurisdiction, having power to take the testimony of witnesses orally or by depositions, in which witnesses can be cross-examined and the Government represented, and whose judgment should be final.

It is not a very pleasant position to be a member of the Committee on Claims; it is a very thankless task. I served on it last Congress, and should have been very glad to have been relieved from service on that committee at the beginning of the present Congress.

I desired to say this much to direct the attention of the Senate again to the necessity of general legislation providing for the payment of claims against the Government, something to relieve Congress of this class of bills, rather than to discuss the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next claims business on the Calendar will be stated.

MARY A. LEWIS.

The bill (S. 1258) for the relief of Mary A Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis, was announced as next in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it. It proposes to pay to Mrs. Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis, $411.22, in full remuneration of the payment made by him out of his own private funds for account of the Government of the United States, while he was acting as its commercial agent at Port au Prince, Hayti, in the year 1855.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE March 10, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1258) for the relief of Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis, having considered the same, offer the following report:

Your committee adopt the favorable report of the Senate Committee on Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress, prepared by Mr. Pike, on the same claim, annexing hereto a copy of that report, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

[Senate Report No. 71, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 600) for the relief of Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

That Joseph N. Lewis, late a resident of the State of Missouri, now deceased, was, in 1885, commercial agent of the United States at Port-au-Prince, Hayti; that on the 22d day of September, in that year, as such commercial agent, he caused the seizure at that port of the American bark Amelia for violation of the neutrality laws of the United States, by reason of her contraband cargo of guns and ammunition; that the fact of the seizure was immediately communicated by the said Lewis to the State Department by a dispatch of the 25th of the same September, and that pursuant to the request of the State Department the United States steamship Saratoga was sent to Port-au-Prince to bring the Amelia and her cargo to New York.

That the said Joseph N. Lewis, in his petition to the Forty-fourth Congress asking relief, states that on the passage to the port of New York the said vessel was forced by stress of weather and damage into the port of St. Thomas; that at that port both the vessel and cargo were condemned and sold by the United States; that the proceeds of the sale were paid into the Treasury of the United States; that in the seizure and subsequent sale of the vessel at Port-au-Prince the petitioner expended of his own money the sum of $411.22, gold, on account of the United States; and that this statement of the petitioner seems to be fully proved.

That, after the departure of the vessel from Port-au-Prince, the said Lewis forwarded to the State Depsrtment a statement of his expenses, with the vouchers for the same, and notified the Department of his having drawn a draft for that sum on that account; that the draft was referred to the Treasury Department; that the Treasury Department informed the holder or maker that there was no appropriation for its payment; and that several applications were afterward made by him to the State Department for the payment of the amount mentioned.

That it appears from the papers submitted to your committee with the aforesaid bill that the committee of a former Congress requested of the State Department any information upon the subject in the possession of the Department; that the Secretary of State, in answer to said request, after a general statement of the facts, which correspond with those continued in this report, adds:

"That Mr. Lewis does not appear to have been expressly authorized to make this seizure, nor was the act approved by this Department, nor the account for the expenses incurred, as is customary, before it could be paid."

But it clearly appears that the seizure was communicated to the State Department at the time it was made; that an account of the expenses incurred by Lewis, with vouchers therefor, were duly furnished to the same Department, and a draft made on the Treasury for the amount; that the only reason for the non-payment of the claim given by the Treasury Department was that no appropriation for such a payment was made; and that the Government accepted the seizure with a knowledge of all the facts, sold the vessel and cargo, received the proceeds of such sale, which duly came to the Treasury and are now there.

It appears that this claim has been presented to the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses; that favorable reports have been made by the Senate Committee on Claims of each of these Congresses, and by one or more of the same committees of the House; and that bills asking the relief asked for in this bill have twice passed the Senate, but have not been reached in the House.

The claim seems to be entirely just, and ought long ago to have been paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS AT LAW OF ANDREW F. M'MILLIN.

The bill (H. R. 897) for the relief of the heirs at law of Andrew F. McMillin, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to the heirs at law of Andrew F. McMillin, deceased, of Fayette County, Kentucky, of $204, for fuel taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE March 10, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 897) entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs at law of Andrew F. McMillin, deceased," having considered the same, instruct me to offer the following report:

The facts in this claim are well stated in the report, No. 87, of the Committee on War Claims of the House, prepared this session by Mr. COMSTOCK.

The following is a copy of that portion of the report reciting the facts:

"Andrew F. McMillin, of Fayette County, Kentucky, on the 29th day of November, 1865, filed in the office of the Quartermaster-General, U. S. A., a claim for quartermaster stores supplied to the Army in 1863. He claimed the price and value of 350 cords of wood, at $3 per cord, amounting to $1,050.

"It appears from the evidence in the case that since the filing of this claim claimant has died intestate, leaving heirs at law, who inherited his rights, and who continue to urge payment of the claim.

"The evidence discloses that the Quartermaster-General investigated the claim through an agent, who found in favor of the claimant—

"First. That he was loyal.

"Second. That a detachment of the Army in 1863 encamped on claimant's land and consumed fuel, consisting of planks, posts, and rails; that at the time referred to the claimant resided on a tract of land adjacent to the city limits of Lexington, in said State.

"After a careful investigation of the case the agent of the Department was unable to find the quantity of stores furnished to the Army, as stated by claimant, but from the evidence before him reported in favor of claimant 34 cords of wood at $6 per cord, amounting to $204, and in submitting said report, at the conclusion of the same, said agent uses the following language:

"'Under all the circumstances I am satisfied compensation should be made, and therefore respectfully recommend the payment of the amount as found.'"

Action on this claim was suspended in the Quartermaster-General's Office for the following reasons, given in a letter of that office dated July 15, 1874:

"The evidence furnished fails to show the authorized taking and subsequent disposition of the stores. Neither receipts, vouchers, or other official evidence, or the testimony of any ex-officer, soldier, agent, or employé of the Government cognizant of the alleged appropriation has been produced."

Although there is no such evidence as above to support the claim, yet there is evidence of neighbors and others establishing the fact that the wood was used by the Army as quartermaster stores, and this evidence is re-enforced by the above-mentioned report and recommendation of the Department's special agent.

Your committee think the report of the special agent, taken with the other evidence, conclusive, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS P. MORGAN, JR.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 972) for the relief of Thomas P. Morgan, jr. It proposes to pay $4,898.04 to Thomas P. Morgan, jr., being the amount of work done by him on the Norfolk Harbor in the years 1881 and 1882, and declared forfeited to the United States by reason of his failure to perform his contract within the time specified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE March 17, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 972) for the relief of Thomas P. Morgan, jr., having considered the same, submit the following report:

This claim was considered by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress, and at its first session the committee submitted a report, prepared by Senator GEORGE, recommending its allowance and payment. It is No. 488 of the Senate reports of that Congress, and is annexed hereto.

The committee adopt the same, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 488, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims have examined this case, and report the facts as follows:

That the claimant, Thomas P. Morgan, entered into a contract with the United States, through the Engineer Department, to do certain work and dredging in the harbor of Norfolk, Va. He failed to perform his contract, and it was declared by the engineer terminated, and the amount then due by the United States to the claimant forfeited. This sum amounts to $4,898.04, and was earned by the claimant, and his right to receive it lost only by a provision in the contract authorizing its forfeiture.

We find that this forfeiture was in strict accordance with the contract. There are, however, some equitable circumstances which we think ought to induce Congress to release the forfeiture, and thus pay the claimant for work actually performed. The contract was forfeited not because the work done was not well done, but because the whole amount of work was not done within the time mentioned in the contract. The claimant asserts, and we think establishes, that the delay was occasioned in large measure by two circumstances, among others, over which he had no control.

First. The contract represented that all the dredging was to be done in soft earth, yet a considerable amount of hard excavation was excavated. This hard material could not be removed by the ordinary clam-dredge, which was entirely suitable for excavating soft material; this was the kind of dredge which the claimant owned and was working when the hard material was excavated.

Second. The commissioner of the harbor made some regulations in relation to the dumping-ground at which claimant was required to dump the excavations. These regulations operated to hinder and delay claimant.

It is true an extension of the time for completing the contract was granted, but claimant was prevented from doing the work by unusual stormy weather.

It is material, however, to be noticed that it is shown that if additional time to complete the contract had been given, as claimant asked, no delay would have resulted to the Government or the people by the delay in improving the harbor thereby occasioned. This we regard as a very material fact in allowing the relief we consider due.

Under all the circumstances, we recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, allowing said sum of $4,898.04.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was this work done? The report does not seem to show.

Mr. PLATT. In 1881 and 1882, the bill says.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it was in 1881.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the bill state?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The bill was read.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHYSICIANS' COMPENSATION IN A CONSPIRACY CASE.

The bill (S. 304) to compensate physicians for services rendered under an order of the United States court of the northern district of Alabama was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "of," to strike out "two thousand" and insert "four hundred;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400, jointly to the following physicians: A. R. Erskine, J. J. Dement, H. W. Bassett, and A. R. Burnett; said sum of money to be received by said physicians, jointly, as full compensation for all services rendered by them, pursuant to an order of the judge of the circuit court of the northern district of Alabama, in the conspiracy case in which F. M. Noogin and Berry O. Wood are defendants.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE April 7, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 304) to compensate physicians for services rendered under an order of the United States court of the northern district of Alabama, having considered same, submit the following report:

This claim has been before the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and reported upon favorably by that committee. Said report is House Report No. 613, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, and is as follows:

"[House Report No. 613, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1763) to compensate physicians for services rendered under an order of the United States court of the northern district of Alabama, having considered the same, report as follows:

"In the year 1879 one Holman Leatherwood, a revenue officer of the United States, on duty in the northern district of Alabama, disappeared under suspicious circumstances, and Berry O. Wood and Warren Noogin were arrested and held to answer for his murder.

"About November 7, 1879, the body of a man, in an advanced stage of decomposition, supposed to be that of Leatherwood, was found, and A. W. McCullough, United States commissioner for said district, ordered A. R. Erskine, J. J. Dement, H. W. Bassett, and A. R. Burnett, reputable physicians, to proceed and examine the body, for the twofold purpose of identification and ascertaining the cause of death. This order was approved and confirmed by the United States district judge for said district.

"The examination was made pursuant to the order, by the four physicians above named, who reported the result, and also attended court and testified in the case.

"They presented a bill for services in making the autopsy, amounting to $400, which bill was approved and allowed by the court; but as there were no funds available for the purpose, the bill was not and never has been paid.

"Your committee find that the service performed was obligatory upon these physicians under the order of the court, and that it was extremely offensive, if not dangerous. The committee find the charge to be very reasonable for the service rendered, and therefore report favorably and recommend the passage of the bill."

It has also been presented to the House at the present Congress and referred to the Committee on Claims, which committee has made a favorable report, which is House Report No. 1071, but as yet it has received no further action by the House.

The following is a copy of said report.

Mr. PIKE. The last report of the House about to be read is only a repetition of the former one already quoted. The facts have already been stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the further reading of the report will be dispensed with.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID WEBSTER.

The bill (H. R. 1464) for the relief of David Webster was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to David Webster, of Concord, N. H., $302.80, balance due him for travel and attendance as a witness before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department of the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE, April 14, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1464), for the relief of David Webster, having considered the same, submit the following:

This claim has been presented to the House of Representatives at the present and former Congresses and favorable reports made thereon.

The following is the report of the House Committee on Claims made at this session, and is House Report No. 154, which the committee adopt. It recites the evidence also:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of David Webster for payment of fees as a witness before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, submit the following report:

The facts in this case were inquired into and fully stated in favorable reports made by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, respectively, the latter of which reports we adopt, and which is as follows:

David Webster, of Concord, N. H., on the 20th day of March, 1876, was duly summoned to appear forthwith before the House Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, of which committee the Hon. Hiester Clymer was chairman. Mr. Webster happened to be in the city at the time of the service of the subpœna, but was the next day intending to leave for his home in New Hampshire. He reported to the committee in obedience to the summons, and was informed by the chairman of said committee that he must remain in attendance upon said committee until his testimony was given, and that he must not depart without leave. In obedience thereto he remained, reporting nearly every day to said committee, until the 7th of April, 1876, when he gave his testimony. (See Report 799, first session Forty-fourth Congress, on "The Management of the War Department," pages 415 to 422.)

After he had testified he requested to be discharged, but the chairman of committee informed him that he would again be wanted. He remained in constant attendance upon said committee until the 8th day of July, 1876, when his papers, which were taken by the committee at the time he gave his testimony on the 7th of April before mentioned, were returned to him, and Mr. Clymer, the chairman of the committee, told him was discharged.

The evidence shows that Mr. Webster had been in attendance as a witness one hunderd and ten days when he was discharged. He claimed pay for that period of time and also for his travel from Concord, N. H., to the city of Washington, 536 miles. He was allowed for attendance only from the 20th day of March to the 5th day of April, twelve days, at $4 a day, $48, and for five days more at $3, $15, making $63 in all, with no allowance for travel.

It appears that Mr. Webster objected to receiving this amount, but finally took the money, protesting that he was entitled to his lawful fees for the full time and for his travel in addition.

On the 13th of June Mr. Webster addressed the following letter to Mr. Clymer, chairman of the committee:

WASHINGTON, June 13, 1876.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned most respectfully asks to be discharged as a witness in cases now under investigation before your honorable committee, if in your opininion there is not a positive necessity for being longer detained. I further desire to have my papers returned that your honor stated would be returned to me when I was no longer needed as a witness by your committee.

Be so good as to order an immediate settlement, that I may not be detained from my home in Concord, N. H., any longer than is absolutely necessary.

I am, very truly, yours, &c.,

DAVID WEBSTER.

To the Hon. H. CLYMER,
Chairman War Department Committee of Investigations,
House of Representatives.

And in response thereto he was notified by Mr. Clymer that he could not be discharged until further notice. Hence he remained until the 8th day of July, 1876, as before stated.

The memorialist says that at the same time Hallett Kilbourn, esq., was confined in the Capitol for contempt, and that he felt obliged to remain in attendance during the long period he did remain, fearing that if he disobeyed the subpœna he might be dealt with the same as Kilbourn.

Your committee are of opinion that witnesses, when summoned to attend before committees of the House by its authority, and who obey the subpœna by actual attendance, as the claimant did in this instance, are entitled to their pay.

Previous to March 29, 1876 (see House resolution passed March 31, 1872), witnesses summoned to appear before the House or its committees were entitled to fees as follows: $4 per day for attendance and 5 cents per mile for travel in coming to or going from the place of examination. On said 29th of March the following resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives:

"The rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before this House, or either of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $3; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of 5 cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial."

In this case Mr. Webster resided several hundred miles from Washington; he was here upon expense the whole time, and your committee recommend that he be paid the lawful fees for the one hundred and ten days, being $339, and his lawful fees for travel from this city, where he was summoned, to his home at Concord, N. H., being 536 miles, at 5 cents per mile, amounting to $26.80 for travel, total $365.80; deducting from which sum the $63 already paid, leaves $302.80 his due, and we report the accompanying bill in order that he may be paid, and recommend its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not ask for the further reading of the report. I have read it through myself.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD FENLON.

The bill (S. 2136) for the relief of Edward Fenlon was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay Edward Fenlon $8,627.98, in accordance with the findings of the Court of Claims on the 27th of April, 1885.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE April 14, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 392) for the relief of Edward Fenlon, having considered the same, submit the following report:

This claim was sent by the House at the last Congress to the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1883, commonly called the Bowman act, to find and report the facts. The findings of fact of that court constitute the appendix to this report.

It appears from those findings that the claimant in January, 1879, entered into a contract with the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri for the transportation of military supplies from Alamosa to Fort Lewis, Colo.

This claim has been considered by the House Committee on Claims of the present Congress, the report of which committee (House Report No. 334) your committee adopt, and of which the following is a copy:

"(1) It appears that said contract between claimant and the United States contains the following provisions, to wit:

"'ART. 12. That, for and in consideration of the faithful performance of the stipulations of this agreement according to the true intent and meaning thereof, the said party of the second part shall be paid at the office of the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri, or by an officer to be by him designated for the purpose, in the legal currency of the United States, at the rate of $2.05 per 100 pounds for the whole distance from Alamosa, Colo., to Fort Lewis, Colo., which is hereby stated and agreed to be 88 miles.' * * *

"'Transportation will in all cases be paid according to the distance from the place of departure to the place of delivery, the distance to be ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri, and in no case to exceed the distance by the shortest practicable route.' * * *

"(2) That 88 miles, as the distance between Alamosa and Fort Lewis, was based upon representations of the officer of the Quartermaster's Department who, on behalf of the United States, entered into said contract with claimant, to the effect that by the middle of summer, and in season for the transportation of the military supplies by the claimant, the chief engineer officer would open a new road between Alamosa and Fort Lewis, the distance of which, as surveyed, was 88 miles; that the United States failed to open said new road for the transportation of said military supplies by the claimant.

"(3) Notwithstanding the failure to open said new road, the claimant was required by the officer of the Quartermaster's Department to transport 386,157 pounds of supplies over what was known as the Conejos cut-off, the distance via which, ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri, was 105 miles; that during the late fall and winter of 1879 and 1880 said cut-off was impracticable for the transportation of said supplies by reason of deep snow in the mountain gorges; that, while said cut-off was thus blocked by snow, the claimant was required by the officers of the Quartermaster's Department to haul 178,219½ pounds of military supplies by the then only practicable road, a distance of 234 miles, as ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the department of the Missouri.

"(4) That, on the 15th of September, 1879, the claimant notified said quartermaster, in substance, that the new road provided for in the contract had never been opened, and that he would be compelled to transport said supplies by a longer route, and that he should expect to be paid for the haul 'from place of departure to place of delivery.' In reference to this notification, the Quartermaster's Department, acting for the United States, agreed that claimant was entitled to be paid from place of departure to place of delivery, and sought to have him so paid; that again, on the 19th of December, 1879, the claimant notified said chief quartermaster that the ordinary road had for more than a month been rendered impracticable, by reason of deep snows, for transporting said military supplies, and that he had been compelled to haul the supplies more than double the distance, by the only practicable route, and requested to be paid for distance necessarily traveled; that said officer agreed that said claimant was entitled to be paid as claimed.

(5) The Court of Claims found that the amount for transporting the supplies 88 miles, at $2.05 per 100 pounds, would be as follows:

386,157 pounds 88 miles equals	$8,142 79
178,219½ pounds 88 miles equals	4,292 60
Total	12,435 39

This amount was paid to the claimant. The Court of Claims found that, if the claimant was allowed for the distance "from place of departure to place of delivery" by the nearest practicable route, at the contract price of $2.05 per 100 pounds, he would have been entitled to the following:

386,157 pounds 105 miles equals	$9,647 96
178,219½ pounds 234 miles equals	11,415 41
Total	21,063 37

That the claimant was only allowed and paid the sum of $12,435.39, on the basis that the military supplies were only transported 88 miles, thus leaving a difference of $8,627.98 between the amount paid claimant and that which would be due him if paid for the distance which the supplies were transported by the shortest practicable route, as fixed and ascertained by the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri.

"The committee are satisfied that said amount of $8,627.98 should be paid the claimant, Edward Fenlon, and herewith submit a substitute for bill H. R. 690, the passage of which the committee recommend, and that the original bill do lie upon the table."

Your committee report herewith a substitute for S. 392, with the recommendation that it do pass, and that bill S. 392 be indefinitely postponed.

APPENDIX.

FINDINGS OF FACT BY COURT OF CLAIMS.

In the Court of Claims, Edward Fenlon vs. The United States, No. 129, Congressional case.

At a Court of Claims held in the city of Washington on the 27th day of April, A. D. 1885, in the cause aforesaid, the court filed findings of fact, and it was ordered that a copy duly certified be reported to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, together with a copy of this order.

BY THE COURT.

Findings of fact filed by the court April 27, 1885.

This case, referred to the court by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, May 23, 1884, under the act of March 3, 1883, ch. 116 (22 Stat. L., 485), having been heard by the court, the Attorney-General, by his assistants, appearing for the defense and protection of the United States, as required by said act, the court, upon the evidence, finds the facts to be as follows:

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. On the 2d day of June, 1879, the claimant, Edward Fenlon, entered into a contract in writing with Col. Rufus Saxton, deputy quartermaster-general and chief quartermaster Department of the Missouri, acting on behalf of the United States, for transportation of military supplies on route 7 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; and that among the provisions of said contract are the following, to wit:

"ART. 12. That for and in consideration of the faithful performance of the stipulations of this agreement, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, the said party of the second part shall be paid at the office of the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri, or by an officer to be by him designated for the purpose, in the legal currency of the United States, at the rate of $2.05 per 100 pounds for the whole distance from Alamosa, Colo., to Fort Lewis, Colo., which is hereby stated and agreed to be 88 miles." * * *

"Transportation will in all cases be paid according to the distance from the place of departure to the place of delivery, the distance to be ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri, and in no case to exceed the distance by the shortest practicable route." * * *

II. That the distance of 88 miles between Alamosa and Fort Lewis, Colo., was based upon the representation of the officer of the Quartermaster's Department, who, on behalf of the United States, entered into said contract with the claimant; that Lieutenant Ruffner, chief engineer officer, would, by the middle of the summer, and in season for the transportation provided for, open a new road between said places, the distance via which, as surveyed, was 88 miles.

III. The new road mentioned in the second finding was not opened, and was not at any time during the continuance of said contract made practicable for the transportation over it of the supplies which were transported under said contract.

IV. The claimant was required by the officer of the Quartermaster's Department, within the time covered by the contract, and when such route was practicable, to transport 386,157 pounds of supplies by a route known as the Conejos cut-off, the distance via which route was ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri at 105 miles.

V. The value of the transportation service performed and specified in the fourth request, according to the distance from the place of departure to the place of delivery, as ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the Departmedt of the Missouri, at the rate of $2.05 per 100 pounds for 88 miles, is $9,647.96, and the amount actually paid the claimant for said service is $8,142.79.

VI. During the late fall and winter of 1879 and 1880 the Conejos cut-off was an impracticable route for transporting said supplies, by reason of the deep snow in the mountain gorges, and during that time the claimant was required by the officers of the Quartermaster's Department to transport 178,219½ pounds of military supplies via the route known as Ojo Caliente and Tierra Amarilla, which was the only practicable route for such transportation, the distance via which route was ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri at 234 miles.

VII. The value of the transportation service performed and specified in the sixth finding, according to the distance from the place of departure to the place of delivery, as ascertained and fixed by the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri, at the rate of $2.05 per 100 pounds for 88 miles, is $11,415.41, and the amount actually paid the claimant for said service is $4,292.60.

VIII. On the 15th of September, 1879, the claimant notified the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri, in substance, that the new road which was to be opened for the transportation of supplies under his contract—the distance via which was stated in the contract at 88 miles—was not opened, and was not likely to be opened, in consequence of which he was compelled to transport said supplies by the old and longer route, and that he should expect to be paid according to the distance from the place of departure to the place of delivery.

IX. The officers of the Quartermaster's Department, acting for and on behalf of the United States in this transaction, in response to this notification, agreed that the claimant was entitled to be paid according to the distance from the place of departure to the place of delivery, and sought to have him so paid.

X. On the 20th of December, 1879, the claimant notified the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Missouri that the ordinary route of transportation had for more than a month been rendered impracticable, by reason of deep snows, for the transportation of supplies, and that he had been compelled to make a detour of more than double the distance, which detour was the only practicable route between the two points, and requested to be paid for the necessarily greater service, and said officers agreed that the claimant was entitled to be paid as claimed.

XI. The Second Comptroller of the Treasury refused to authorize the payment to the claimant for the supplies transported via the Conejos cut-off, specified in the fourth request, of more than $8,142.79, and he also refused to authorize payment to the claimant for the supplies transported via the Ojo Caliente and Tierra Amarilla route, specified in the sixth request, of more than $4,292.60.

ORDER OF COURT.

APRIL 27, 1885.

Ordered, That a copy of the foregoing findings of fact, duly certified, be reported to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, together with a copy of this order.

BY THE COURT.

A true transcript of record. Test this 9th day of January, 1886.

[SEAL.] JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH E. E. PERINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2265) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, widow and administratrix of William Perine, deceased.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

Mr. PLATT. I think I shall object to this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the case will go over under the rule.

Mr. PLATT. It can not go through without considerable discussion, and I presume the committee would prefer to take up those cases which will not raise debate.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. This is one of five or six cases of a similar kind which have been very thoroughly considered by the committee and by a commission appointed by the Government. They have been explained three or four times to the Senate, always attracting notice, as they should properly, and they have gone through unanimously every time when explained. I believe this is one of that class; but they are a very important class of cases, and it is very proper that they should not be taken up in the ten minutes we now have left.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. PLATT. I simply say it ought to be discussed.

JOHN WILLIAMS.

The bill (S. 2266) for the relief of John Williams was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $1,000 to John Williams, of San Francisco, Cal., in full for his claim against the United States for injuries and loss caused to him by the fall of an elevator in the United States appraiser's building in San Francisco, Cal., on the 2d of December, 1880.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. PIKE from the Committee on Claims April 28, 1886, but before concluding was interrupted by,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest by unanimous consent that the reading of the report be finished. It is but a few lines. It will be no use to-morrow to read half a dozen lines then. I do not propose to go on with the case now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and the reading of the report will be concluded.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom, at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, was referred the bill (S. 335) referring the claim of John Williams to the Court of Claims, herewith present the following report:

This bill was referred to the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 485), commonly called the Bowman act.

This statute only authorizes the court to find the facts and "report the same to the committee or the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration." The Court of Claims did not make its report to the Senate Committee on Claims of the last Congress, but to the committee of the present Congress.

The finding of the facts by the court, as reported to the Committee on Claims, may be found in the appendix to this report.

It appears, in brief, by the finding of the court, that the claimant was a servant of a coal merchant of San Francisco, Cal., and was directed by his employer to deliver certain bags of coal to the examining-room of the appraisers, located on the second floor of the United States appraisers' building in San Francisco; that on reaching the building of the appraisers' office he inquired of the superintendent of laborers (whom the committee understand to be a United States official) where he should put the coal; that the superintendent directed him to take it to the appraisers' office, and to put it upon the elevator and to take it to the office in that way; that the load which claimant put upon the elevator was the usual load; that the elevator was started by the United States engineer in charge; that it fell; that the fall of the elevator was due to the untying of the rope binding down the rope supporting the elevator; that the elevator was a temporary one, not provided with ordinary safeguards; that the rope was not regularly examined; had it been examined the defect which produced the accident would have been detected; that the fall of the elevator was caused by the defect in the knot or rope, which could have been discovered by the men in charge of the elevator by the use of reasonable care, and that the claimant was without fault in getting on the elevator and while he was on it before the accident.

It further appears by the finding of the court that in consequence of the accident the claimant lost his labor for eight months; that he had been receiving $60 per month, which would make his loss $480; that he was obliged to engage the service of a nurse for five and one-half months, at $50 a month, amounting to $275, which he has paid, or is liable to pay; and that he claims $500 for medical attendance, but that it does not appear what amount he has paid or is liable to pay.

It further appears that although he is now engaged in the same kind of employment, and receiving the same wages, he is not as strong and well as before the accident, and can not perform as much labor.

Your committee are of the opinion that this accident was caused by the carelessness and want of reasonable attention on the part of the United States officials in charge of the appraisers' building, and the elevator; that it was by the direction of the superintendent the claimant entered upon it, and that the claimant was in no fault.

The committee recognize the rule that the Government is not legally responsible for the laches of its officers or agents. Prior to the organization of the Court of Claims in 1856 all claims against the Government had to be passed upon by Congress, and a claimant had no other means of redress. As ordinarily understood, a claimant had no legal right against the Government. He could not sue the Government, and no court had jurisdiction of any claim against the Government, or any authority to hear or render judgment in favor of any claimant against it. None of its property could be taken by a claimant to satisfy his demand, no matter how just it might be. In fact, that is so now. Up to the organization of that court Congress had reserved to itself the entire jurisdiction of all claims against the Government, whether arising from tort or from contract.

By the law constituting that court it gave to the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine, (1) all claims founded upon any law of Congress or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, and all claims which may be referred to it by either House of Congress; (2) all set-offs, counter-claims, claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever, on the part of the Government of the United States against any person making claim against the Government in said court; (3) the claim of any paymaster, quartermaster, commissary of subsistence, or other disbursing officer of the United States, or his administrators or executors, for relief from responsibility on account of capture or otherwise, while in the line of his duty, of Government funds, vouchers, records, or papers in his charge, and for which such officer was and is held responsible; (4) and, by subsequent acts, of all claims for the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, as provided by the act of March 12, 1863, chapter 120, or by the act of July 2, 1864, chapter 225, being an act in addition thereto.

But even under the law establishing this court it has no authority to do anything more than to find the amount due, and to certify the same to Congress. It can issue no process to enable the claimant to secure payment of the amount it finds due.

It will be seen that all claims against the Government for tort arising from the carelessness and laches of its officials and agents stand just as they did before the Court of Claims was established, and are to be decided by Congress according to their merits, and the view Congress may take of the justice and equity of each case; and this point was formally decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Nichols vs. United States, 8 Wall., 123.

The court say in this case, page 275:

"These reflections admonish us to be cautious that we do not permit the decisions of this court to become authority for the righting in the Court of Claims of all wrongs done to individuals by the officers of the General Government, though they may have been committed while serving that Government, and in the belief that it was for its interest. In such cases, when it is proper for the nation to furnish a remedy, Congress has wisely reserved the matter for its own determination. It certainly has not conferred it on the Court of Claims."

It would seem from this that it was not the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States that Congress can not grant relief to an individual arising from the tortious act of a Government official, either by general or special legislation, but on the other hand that the right of giving a remedy to an injured citizen exists in Congress.

It certainly has always been so understood and practiced from the earliest history of our Government.

As the negligence is found by the Court of Claims to be all on the side of the Government, the claimant would be clearly entitled to recover were his contest with a private citizen or corporation. The question is therefore presented whether his right is affected by the fact that the offending party is the Government.

The non-existence of a judicial remedy does not affect the right. The existence of a right as against the Government in cases of tort is fully recognized by that distinguished jurist Judge Cooley, who, in his work on torts, says (page 122):

"Even the State or General Government may be guilty of individual wrongs, for while each is a sovereign it is a corporation also, and as such is capable of doing wrongful acts. The difficulty here is with the remedy, not with the right. No sovereignty is subject to suits, except with its own consent. But either this consent is given by general law or some tribunal is established with power to hear all just claims, or, if neither of these is done, the tort remains, and it is always to be presumed that the legislative authority will make the proper provision for redress when its attention is directed to the injury."

The rule that the Government is not liable for the laches of its agents is a legal one, and one that properly may be applied in courts of law, but that, notwithstanding this legal rule, it has always been understood that Congress was an equitable tribunal, having full jurisdiction and authority to grant relief to an injured citizen, who, without fault, had received an injury by the carelessness of a Government agent. Of course, relief is not to be granted unless the claim is entirely meritorious, the claimant without fault, and the injury caused by the carelessness of the public agent, and in a matter connected with the discharge of a duty which he is performing. The Government ought not to be held liable for the willful or criminal act of its agent.

The committee, then, are of the opinion that the rule, as applied in courts of law, that the Government is not liable for the laches of its agents, does not bind, and ought not to, the action of Congress. This claimant is found to be without fault, and the damage to him was occasioned by the gross carelessness and negligence of the United States officers, the superintendent directing him to use the elevator, which was unsafe, and which any proper inspection would have shown him that it was.

It is believed that there is not a court of law in the country, State or Federal, that would not hold a corporation or an individual responsible to the claimant upon the facts here found. The equities in the claimant's favor could hardly be stronger. The committee think that the Government should be responsible, and that the measure of damages should be $1,000 in full for all claim.

The committee adhere to the opinion they have often expressed, that the United States ought not to be held responsible for the mistakes, negligence, or wanton misconduct of officials who are exercising the functions of Government aids as judges, district attorneys, consuls, marshals, and the like.

Liability to such damage is incident to all human society. Against it no government administered by human instrumentalities can save the citizen. But where the Government is engaged in transacting some business for the public advantage, such as transporting mails, navigating ships, occupying or constructing buildings, and its servants, by their negligence, cause injuries for which a private master would in like case be held responsible, we think there should be a remedy. If the claimant had been hurt by a United States mail wagon, or his ship destroyed by a collision at sea with a national vessel, the Government would, in conformity with its power held heretofore, afford an indemnity.

We think this is a case similar.

By section 7 of the act of March 3, 1883, it is provided—

"That the reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress, until the same shall be finally acted upon."

The committee therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

APPENDIX.

[In the Court of Claims. Term 1884-'85. John Williams vs. The United States. Congressional case No. 6.]

At a Court of Claims held in the city of Washington, on the 2d day of March, 1885, the court filed findings of fact in the cause aforesaid, and it was ordered that a copy be certified to the Committee on Claims of the Senate of the United States.

[L. S.] BY THE COURT.

FINDINGS OF FACT.

This case, referred to the court by the Committee on Claims of the Senate, January 18, 1884, under the act of March 3, 1883, ch. 116 (22 Stat. L., 485), having been heard by the court, the Attorney-General, by his assistants, appearing for the defense and protection of the United States, as required by said act, the court, upon the evidence, finds the facts to be as follows:

I.

The claimant, who was in the employ of Arthur M. Ebbetts, a coal merchant of San Francisco, Cal., as a driver of a coal-cart, was, on the 2d day of December, 1880, sent by his employer to deliver certain bags of coal to the examining-room of the appraisers' office, located on the second floor of the United States appraisers' building in San Francisco. The coal was to be taken by the elevator to the examining-room, which was the usual mode of delivering coal.

II.

On his arrival at the building he unloaded the bags of coal, ten in number, weighing 100 pounds each, onto a hand-truck, ran a part of the same on an elevator, which had been put up for temporary use, running from the first to the second stories of the building, and started up with this load to the second floor. As the elevator reached the second floor the rope supporting it became untied and it gave way, precipitating the claimant and the load a distance of 16 feet, the claimant receiving severe injuries in the lumbar region, the spine, and about the temple.

III.

When the claimant reached the building of the appraisers' office he inquired of the superintendent of laborers where he should put the coal. The superintendent, after being informed by claimant that it was for the appraisers' office, said it must go upstairs. Claimant inquired whether he could take it up on the elevator. Superintendent requested the engineer to put on steam. He then directed claimant to put the coal on the elevator, and requested him at the same time to be expeditious, as the men were leaving the building, it being about the time of closing. Superintendent proposed to go up with the first load, so as to give claimant time to load the balance. Claimant first consented that he might do so, but then said he better not go, for the reason that he would get soiled in unloading the coal, and the superintendent consented to that arrangement.

IV.

In consequence of said injuries claimant was unable to resume his former occupation until the 17th day of August, 1881, at which date he re-entered the employ of Mr. Ebbetts at the same pay he had been receiving, to wit, $60 per month. He was paid by Mr. Ebbetts up to December 18, 1880, making a loss of wages for eight months, at $60 per month, $480.

V.

Claimant was also compelled to hire a person to attend him during his sickness, and he agreed to pay said attendant at the rate of $50 per month for five and a half months, $275, of which he has paid $100.

VI.

Claimant was also put to the expense of medical attendance, which he estimates at $500, but has not satisfactorily proven what amount he has paid or agreed to pay.

VII.

To all appearances the claimant has recovered; but by medical examination while no special lesion can be traced to the accident, in the opinion of the physician, the general effect of the accident has been to cause a deterioration of his general health and strength.

The claimant, however, now performs substantially the same labor he did before the accident, and receives the same wages; but he can not do the same amount of labor without inconvenience and pain.

VIII.

A medical examination, on the 24th of April, 1884, established the fact that the claimant is not as strong as he would have been but for the accident; that there is a deterioration of his health and strength which may be permanent; that he may never be as strong as he was before the accident, or able to do the same amount of work.

IX.

The load which the claimant put on the elevator was the usual load. The elevator was started by the United States engineer in charge. The fall of the elevator was due to the untying of a cord binding down the rope supporting the elevator. The elevator was a temporary one, not provided with ordinary safeguards. The rope was not regularly examined. Had it been examined, the defect which produced the accident could have been detected.

The fall of the elevator was the result of the defect in the knot or rope which could have been discovered by the men in charge of the elevator by the exercise of reasonable care.

The claimant was without fault in getting on the elevator, and while he was on it before the accident. There was a stairway from the first floor to the second, and no substantial obstacle in the way of claimant carrying the coal up the stairs.

By the court.

A true transcript of record.

Test this 10th day of March, 1885.

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to the further consideration of that bill under the eighth rule. I disagree with the report, and I want a chance to discuss it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say the same thing if I shall be here.

BRIDGE BILLS.

Mr. MCMILLAN. A committee of conference was appointed by the Senate on—

The bill (H. R. 7646) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge by the Dakota Central Railway Company across the Missouri River at Pierre, Dak.;

The bill (H. R. 2309) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the Nashville, Jackson and Memphis Railroad Company over the Tennessee River;

The bill (H. R. 5677) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, Minn., to the opposite shore, in the State of Wisconsin;

The bill (H. R. 3519) authorizing the Interstate Rapid-Transit Railway Company to build a bridge across the Kansas River;

The bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company of Texas to maintain a bridge across Red River; and

The bill (H. R. 5786) granting to the Gainesville and Chickasaw Bridge Company the consent of the United States to construct and maintain a bridge over Red River at or near Brown's Ferry, in Cooke County, Texas.

The committee was composed of the same personnel in each case. The committee met with the House conferees and the House have agreed to all the amendments of the Senate and have receded from their disagreement to them. That fact has been communicated to the Senate, as I am informed by the Secretary. Therefore I present the reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A message has come from the House to that effect in each case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not require any action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all. The bills are passed by the action of the House.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5251) making an appropriation for the repairs and enlargement of the post-office and court-house at Des Moines, Iowa, and fixing a limit therefor, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (H. R. 7021) to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads within the State of Kansas and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 7735) making an appropriation to complete the public building at Hannibal, Mo., in accordance with the original plan of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and to make the same fireproof, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations under the head of "Office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails," after line 99, section 1, to insert:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Senate for any length of time. As I shall vote for this amendment to the bill and as a very wide latitude has been taken in regard to its merits, I propose to say a few words which shall disclose my own views on this matter.

The amendment proposes:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with such American steamships, for a term of not less than five years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance, in the most direct and feasible sailing course, between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

If this were justly subject to the characterization which has been given to it on this side of the House as an unreasonable subsidy, I should have refused to give it my support. If it had been a bill donating a hundred million or one hundred and seventy million acres of public land by the law granting which the title had reverted to the United States, valued at one or two or three or five hundred millions of dollars, I should have refused my consent as a Senator to its passage. But, sir, I do not so regard it. It is a mere appropriation for the service of the mails, the foreign-mail service of the country; and the question of its propriety must depend entirely on the fact whether it may reasonably be expected to advantage the foreign-mail service and to produce an incidental benefit to the country.

Certainly it is not reasonable to suppose whether the Government in part aids the building of the steamship or appropriates the entire cost of it, that by that fact it will be enabled to do a profitable business, that it will be remunerative, that it will establish great connections, that it will be the foundation of commercial relations with the port or country to which it may be sent. No such anticipation may reasonably be founded upon any expenditure of the Government in the construction of American steamships or in inducing the construction of them; but it is the first and necessary step toward any connection with a foreign country, toward the possible institution of commercial relations with them, that there should be some impression made of the character, the dignity, and the enterprise of this Government and this people to sustain its citizens in their connections abroad. There must be some facility of intercourse, and there must be attached to it some appearance of power and of dignity.

Now, sir, for that reason, and that reason alone, I am willing to expend this $800,000. True, it is subject to the objections that have been made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], that it will not revolutionize the existing commercial relations of those countries. There are other methods which are necessary to the internal economies of this country and to its business relations, upon which its business relations with them must depend. Its financial condition, its capacity to do what England does, loan money, give credits, these are the necessary foundations of commerce, the capacity to give cheaper goods, credits, cheaper transportation, the means of establishing commercial intercourse, all those economies are necessary, in addition to the enterprise of our citizens and adaptation of our merchandise to their wants. But while this is true, something may be hoped for from frequent and easy intercourse with them. While we are their customers for nearly $50,000,000, we may reasonably hope by imitating England in her intercourse with them that we at least reap a part of the advantages of their trade.

It is certainly true that when these vessels are constructed, if they shall be induced by these five years' contracts, the increased wages of American seamen, the greater cost of living, all these things may be impediments that it may require legislation to remove; but still the fact remains that you have a foreign postal service, and it is becoming to the character and the dignity of this people that it should be done in vessels equal in every respect to those of other countries. It is proper that the Government should contribute something to induce that.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] yesterday read a very admirable paper which contained some very forcible objections to the foreign postal contract service as established in England, which were well-founded. Certainly they have a tendency to crush private enterprise, to crush competition. They are subject to the objection that they give an advantage to the contractor aided by the Government; receiving Government aid he may be able to disadvantage all competitors. But what suggestion is there made to avoid it? You must have regularity of service. You can not depend upon the occasional voluntary offer of transportation of mails to foreign countries in vessels offered as the occasion may present itself. You must have some preparation, some regularity, and you must contract for it or you can not have the foreign mail service. It might be possible, perhaps, that a bounty offered to the fastest sailing vessel for a given number of trips, a bounty adequate to induce enterprise, might perhaps accomplish the purpose and stimulate private enterprise better than to make a contract with a single firm or several firms for a number of years even where the vessel is classified and the highest conditions of skill and of efficiency are required; but that is an undigested and an unconsidered system in relation to our postal service. It is a suggestion which perhaps may be matured in time. I do not perceive any inconsistency in it, even with the recognition by law of the right to free ships.

Now this has been offered, it has been considered by the committee, it is not disapproved by those who are to have charge of this service, and it is the only practicable thing now presented, whether we shall give this $800,000 to some extent as an inducement to the construction of additional steam-vessels and as a compensation for the service. I have no doubt that free ships is the true policy of this country, but I am not averse to giving encouragement by bounties for the construction of American ships when it is paid as a reasonable payment for mail service. I think it is the proper object of statesmanship to develop a great commercial marine by whatever means it may be practicable, and when you can give employment to American labor without oppressing the great body of the people, when you can give efficiency to the American commercial marine without any great burden on the great body of the people, it is the policy of statesmanship and good policy to do it. It does not touch any question of Democratic policy, the policy of sympathy with the better condition of the people, the policy of doing justice to every branch of industry and every employment, the Democratic policy of doing that which will promote the welfare of all the people by the administration of the Federal Government within its constitutional functions. That is the great spirit of the Democratic party—opposition to monopolies, opposition to exclusive rights, the fair and just opportunity for all men and all pursuits.

But how does this efficient foreign-mail service interfere with that, and what connection has it with that? It is not a subsidy in the objectionable sense of the term. It is true it is to some extent an appropriation beyond the possible lowest price at which the service may be obtained, but it is not an appropriation beyond the amount which is necessary to secure the most efficient, regular, and suitable service for the transportation of the foreign mails. I doubt whether this appropriation is large enough to establish a mail service of the most efficient character. It can not therefore be decided to be anything outside of the regular, the appropriate, and the economical means of carrying on the foreign-mail service of the country.

Mr. President, I scarcely think the broad discussion which has been gone into on this subject is germane to it. I think we might concede every proposition made by the Senator from Kentucky and every proposition made by the Senator from Missouri, and yet it would remain true that the foreign-mail service is a necessity for the business interests of the country. Even if you import your coffee from Brazil by way of Great Britain, if you conduct your exchanges through a foreign country, you require a foreign-mail service. Even for the purpose of commercial travel, looking no further than that, you require an efficient mail service. Even for the purpose of having your country respected, and its character and influence among the nations of the world properly appreciated, you need an efficient foreign-mail service.

Certainly it is becoming to the dignity of this country that it should have a service done in American bottoms and, if it be possible, with American sailors. If you can by the expenditure of a reasonable amount, a sum of money not disproportioned to the means of the country to accomplish that object, certainly there can be no ground of argument because there are certain economic conditions which are necessary to effect a successful and a profitable commercial intercourse with those countries. Those matters are foreign, however true they may be, and I accept as true many of these propositions.

I have no question that the establishment of a system of free trade in ships subject to reasonable conditions would be a benefit to the commerce of this country. I have no doubt that it would tend, and tend by a considerable degree, to the establishment of a permanent commercial marine in this country; that it would induce American boys to become American sailors, and that by degrees we would build up a class of seamen and increase their numbers and restore the number to what it has been heretofore. But I can not for my life see how, from the fact that these economic conditions are necessary to the establishment of a foreign commerce which shall be extensive and profitable to the establishment of a commercial marine, Senators object to the adoption of this provision here for the establishment of a postal service which shall be efficient and speedy.

If it could have been done without becoming obnoxious to the rules of the Senate I think it would have been well if the amendment had required that these vessels should be of a class equal to the best in the world in point of efficiency, in point of safety, in point of rapidity, and in point of durability; that their classification including these qualities should be vessels equal to the mail service of any other country. But I can not perceive that there is any force in the objections which have been made to this provision here upon the ground that it is an objectionable subsidy. How do you get your mail service upon the railways of the country? Can you measure precisely and accurately the extent to which that compensation is a proper one. Is it not an inducement to rapidity of speed, is it not a compensation as well for service as for services rendered?

The amendment in the bill is purely an amendment in the interest of the postal service. If foreign mail service be a desirable thing, if it be a necessary thing, if it is a wise object of public policy, then the means by which it must be accomplished are suitable and proper, and no one in the whole argument has suggested a better means or a more profitable means by which the foreign mail service with these countries can be established.

You must have regularity and certainty as well as expedition, and you can not have them unless you arrange for it. That should be done in American vessels, and this bounty, if you choose to term it so, this payment, this compensation for mail service, as I regard it, should be given to American ships to encourage them to that extent, at least if no other one is ever built. It certainly is not a matter of proper or reasonable objection.

Therefore I have no hesitation in giving to this provision of the bill my support.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Delaware yield two minutes to me? I proposed to make a speech on the bill, but I will compromise for two minutes for something else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BELFAST, ME.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the pending measure may be informally laid aside, and that the bill (H. R. 1027) for the extension and repair of the public building at Belfast, Me., may be passed. It has been twice approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Architect, has passed the House of Representatives, and it is important, I am informed by the member of the other House from that district, that it should be passed at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides for an extension of the public building at Belfast, Me., in accordance with plans and specifications of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and for putting the building in a thorough state of repair; and for the purposes named the sum of $15,000 is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I am obliged to the Senator from Delaware.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not intend to make a speech upon this question, but I wish to express my opposition to the pending amendment. It is not the first time I have met a proposition somewhat similar to this on appropriation bills for the postal service, and on former occasions I have expressed my disapproval of such appropriations.

It seems to me that it must strike every one that instead of promoting the postal facilities of this country by the adoption of the amendment its effect must necessarily be to embarrass the rapid and regular transmission of the mails to the various foreign countries named in the bill. The law as it now stands authorizes the Postmaster-General to contract for the delivery of the mails to all those points, and to every foreign country, and the Postmaster-General has no difficulty whatever in making contracts to deliver the mails, not only to the countries named in the bill but to every other foreign country. He informs us in his annual report that the postal service is regularly transmitted, much more regularly transmitted than it can be done by a single subsidized line.

We have now a line running down into the South American republics, to Rio, I believe. It makes about monthly trips, and yet the mails can be sent there by the present arrangement almost weekly. We have a line running to the island of St. Thomas, where the mails are delivered and taken by the French and English steamers that pass at those points almost weekly. So far as the frequency of the transmission of the mails is concerned, they can be now transmitted much more frequently than they can be under the provisions of this bill, which ties up the hands of the Postmaster-General to some one particular line to deliver the mails.

Then in reference to speed, I apprehend that the American line which now runs and which would be subsidized by this bill does not make any better time than the steamers by which the mail goes out at present. Our mails go from New York to the island of St. Thomas and are transmitted by English and French steamers occasionally from that point, but also sometimes go by our own line, as the exigencies of the service require.

The Postmaster-General avails himself of all the vessels within his reach for the purpose of sending the mails down to the South American republics. So the pretense that this is to aid in the transmission of the mails is but a pretense. Every man familiar with the postal operations of this country must know that instead of aiding the Postmaster-General in sending forward the American mails it would hinder and be an obstruction to the frequent transmission of the mails to those points.

The provision says it is for the purpose of securing a "greater frequency and regularity in dispatch." There never was a greater mistake. If the committee who framed this amendment suppose that there can be any greater regularity or any more frequency in dispatch under this provision they are certainly laboring under a very great misapprehension.

The transmission of the foreign mails of this country to the places named in the bill cost I believe less than a hundred thousand dollars a year; and yet it is proposed to take out of the public Treasury the money paid there by taxes upon the people to the amount of $800,000 annually without aiding the postal service in the least iota; for in all the arguments which have been made I have heard no gentleman assert that this would in any respect aid the frequency or the regularity of the transmission of the mails of this country anywhere.

So, while this pretends to be for the aid of the postal service, I apprehend that there is not a single Senator upon this floor who looks at the question properly or candidly who can come to the conclusion that it would aid it in the least particular, but, on the contrary, it must be a hindrance to the Postmaster-General in the discharge of the duties of the office in sending the mails to foreign countries. Then the cost of it is at least eight times the cost of the present mail service.

But it is very apparent from all the arguments which have been made on this subject that the principal excuse for this appropriation is the aid that is to be furnished to the commerce of the country. I unhesitatingly assert as my honest conviction that, instead of promoting the commerce of the country, it will operate exactly the reverse. If you subsidize a line from New York to Rio and give them $100,000 or $200,000, that line can carry freights and passengers at a cheaper rate than any other line which can be started from that point without a subsidy. It becomes a monopoly in fact. This very provision of subsidizing steamship lines either to Rio, to Buenos Ayres, or to any other port, necessarily excludes competition with that line, because with the advantage of the subsidy they can drive any other line from the ocean.

What was the effect of a subsidized line from the city of New York a few years ago? Prior to that time we had a line of packets running from Baltimore to Rio, which had been established for fifty years and was bringing to this country almost all the coffee that was used in it. The New York merchants wanted the trade centered in their city. A line was put on and Congress subsidized it, and what was the effect? Those Baltimore packets were driven from the sea. The coffee trade of Baltimore was broken up by the subsidy which was paid to the New York line, and that line was enabled to bring coffee at cheaper rates than the packet lines from Baltimore. The consequence was that the packet lines almost disappeared from the ocean.

So when you subsidize a line to any port, I care not where it is, it can exclude competition because it can put down the freights and drive competition from the seas. Such will be the effect of this provision. Instead of aiding your commerce the subsidizing of lines is calculated to injure, and it must necessarily operate to the injury of commerce, to the injury of the transmission of produce and of passengers. Nor will it aid the building of your ships, because unless you can put ships on the line men will not build ships. Therefore there will be no encouragement by reason of the subsidy to a certain given line. There will be no inducement whatever for ship-builders, or persons likely to engage in the carrying trade, to invest their money in ships which must be met upon the seas by subsidized lines, and therefore unable to run.

In my opinion this amendment is calculated not only to defeat the very object that it proposes in reference to postal affairs but to defeat the ultimate object which is aimed at in the bill, the aid of the commerce of the country by subsidizing particular lines.

We are met, however, with the argument that England and France have resorted to subsidies, and therefore it is necessary we should do the same thing. The effect of subsidies upon French commerce is shown in a report which has been read and commented upon, particularly by the Senator from Kentucky. I have not that report before me, but it can be shown from the report that the effect of subsidizing those lines instead of increasing the commerce of France has operated to the injury of the commerce of France; whereas Germany without a subsidy has been increasing her commerce against the competition with French subsidized lines. But our situation is very different. Even if it was proper in France and proper in England to give subsidies to steamship lines, we are in a very different position.

England has paid for the carrying of her mails to her possessions all over the world, and the islands of the sea, her colonies everywhere. Wanting to keep up communication with her dependencies she has put on lines and paid them to carry the mails to those points, because there was not sufficient trade to sustain steam lines without such aid. That necessitated the action of France because of her close juxtaposition, and the subsidized lines of England, unless there were subsidies given by France, would take all the carrying trade away from that country. But we are not in competition with England; we are not in competition with France; we are 3,000 miles away from them. However, if we were brought in competition with them we could not hope to subsidize all the lines which are necessary to carry on the commerce of this country. That would bankrupt our Treasury. But you must have particular lines to subsidize, which, as I before remarked, would operate to exclude competition with those lines, and your commerce would be confined exclusively to the carrying lines which were subsidized.

Mr. President, we want to build up a commerce with the South American republics, but it is not to be done by subsidizing steamship lines; we must adapt ourselves to the wants of the people of the South American republics. The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] yesterday read some extracts from testimony given by persons perfectly familiar with the condition of affairs there, who state that our manufacturers and merchants do not carry down there the goods the people want. I remember reading in an address delivered before one of the committees of this body by Mr. William E. Curtis an emphatic statement that while we could compete with the Manchester mills in certain lines of cotton goods we were not making that class of cotton goods which was demanded by the South American republics. He stated that the whole commerce of those islands amounted to about $250,000,000, $65,000,000 of which were in cotton goods, and he claimed that our mills were not furnishing that class of goods which was demanded by the South American people. The consequence is that the English mills have adapted themselves to the wants, the customs, the habits, and the requirements of the people, and that England is having almost the exclusive trade in the class of cotton goods which the people of the South American republics want.

In order to build up a commerce we must adapt ourselves to the wants and requirements of the people. There is no better law of trade fixed, I suppose, than that if you want to deal with any people you must furnish them with the goods they require at prices as cheap as they can obtain the same goods from any other point; and then you must buy what they have to sell and pay them as much as they can get from anybody else. A violation of that law of trade will necessarily operate to exclude any community from trade. If we want to trade with the South American republics we must furnish them such goods as they want and furnish them at such prices as will be equal to anybody else's prices, and we must buy from them their commodities and buy them at prices which other people will pay for them.

If you had a line or ten lines of steamers from the cities of New York, Boston, and other points running to South America, running to Rio, running to Buenos Ayres, running to Chili, Peru, and every other point in South America, you must have the goods to put upon those vessels such as they want and such as they will buy, or you could not sell to them if you had a hundred steamship lines.

Again, if you want to deal with that people you must not only sell to them what they want and at prices they can afford to pay but you must buy from them what they have to sell and give them as much as they can get for it from anybody else. We can do neither. Mr. Curtis says our mills do not manufacture the kind of cotton goods adapted to the tastes and wants of the people of the South American republics, and he complains that while our mills will turn out a superior article they will not adapt themselves to the wants of those people. Whenever that is done, as my colleague [Mr. GRAY] suggests, you will find the ships to carry them. Whenever you can make the transportation of passengers and merchandise profitable vessels will meet the necessity and be glad of the opportunity of doing it.

But if you can furnish the goods, could you buy what they have got to sell? England will take their goods and carry them to England unhampered by any tariff law; but the moment their goods come here, a large proportion of them at least, the importer is met at the custom-house in New York with a demand for a certain amount of duty upon those goods. The consequence is that the importer can not afford to buy them, because he can not afford to sell them at the prices at which he would be compelled to sell them.

The instance of the gentleman from Boston who was alluded to the other day by the Senator from Missouri is a striking illustration of this. He had sent out a ship, he had carried out merchandise, he had sold it, he had bought other goods, but the tariff here excluded him from selling in our market, and he had to carry them to a market where there was no tariff on those goods, and he went from the city of New York to Liverpool in order to sell his cargo. I believe that enterprise failed. The merchant found that it would not pay him the necessary profits.

On almost everything that we import from South America we must pay a duty. The consequence is that we can not afford to pay as much for those goods in South America as the English merchant pays for them who takes them to Liverpool and London and sells them without being embarrassed by tariff duties.

It is true that their coffee comes here free, and we buy very largely from them. I do not exactly understand all the complication surrounding the coffee trade, but I understand the English merchants have a mortgage upon the coffee plantations of South America and control the exportation of that article. They have trusted the coffee-raisers, the men engaged in that business, and have a kind of lien upon the crops, as I understand. I think that fact was asserted by Mr. Curtis in the address which he delivered on another measure, not upon this, that having that mortage they can control the export very largely. I have not much doubt that through the intervention of the English importers and merchants with the Brazilian Government after we had taken off the duty on coffee that government was induced to put on an export duty of 2 per cent.

The fact is that we had as well look at this thing candidly, fairly, and squarely. We are overproducing. We are producing more than we have got a market for not only of agricultural products but our manufactures are producing more. We are largely shut up, so far as manufacturing is concerned, and confined to our own market. The consequence is that your factories are full, your hands are striking for higher wages. The manufacturer must curtail his expenses, and one of the modes by which he does it after his factory is full of goods is to reduce the wages of his employés or put them upon partial time. The result is that dissatisfaction exists, and we have some evidence of it to-day in the strikes all over the country.

We had as well look at this question fairly. We need some other points to which we can send our goods besides our home market. Our cereals are so low in price now that they scarcely pay the cost of raising. We can produce much more wheat and corn than we are doing. We can supply and have been supplying the foreign demand, but the points we are supplying do not take enough to make the planting and raising of cereals profitable to the people of this country. We ought to have further outlets for them. We ought to have the markets of the South American and Central American republics. We ought to adapt our legislation so that we can secure those markets not only for the purpose of sending out manufactured goods, which has been the chief argument here in this debate, but so that we can sell all our agricultural products which they may require.

We shall never do that while we have a protective tariff which taxes one man for the benefit of his fellow-man. We must have revenue, and I am in favor of paying just the amount of revenue which is necessary to properly and appropriately administer the Government without undue extravagance or without parsimony; but we ought never to lay one single dollar upon anything the people of this country have to consume beyond what is absolutely required for the purposes of the support of the Government. In my opinion we have no right to do it. The taxing power was not given to us for the purpose of building up fortunes for one man or one set of men at the expense of the great mass of the people who pay the taxes. We had as well realize the fact that we have got to reduce our tariff rates at some time, or we are shut up exclusively to our home market, not only for our manufactured goods, but very largely also for our agricultural products.

In the interests of the industries of this country, both manufacturing and agricultural, I here and now express my firm conviction that the true interest of all classes demands a reduction of our taxation so that we can carry on the trade with other countries and avail ourselves of any market which those countries may afford.

Mr. CALL. I wish to make a single remark in reply to the Senator from Delaware. There is nothing in the amendment which requires the Postmaster-General to pay $800,000 to one line, or to two lines, or to three lines. So far as the provision goes he may distribute the appropriation among ten lines or any number of lines. Nor is it confined to one port. There can be no objection to it on the ground that it may be made a monopoly and be given to one line.

Mr. PLUMB. If any other Senator desires to occupy a portion of time between now and 3 o'clock, I shall yield.

Mr. HALE. I wish to take one moment to state what I was not able to do yesterday when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] brought in the explanation of the Post-Office Department in reference to an account which I had given about a large body of United States mails being left at Pernambuco when its destination was the port of Rio de Janeiro. Since yesterday I have been able to read the explanation, and I find that it leaves, as it seems to me, the Post-Office Department in even a worse condition than the account originally given placed it, for it appears that the Postmaster-General intrusted the United States mail which was to be sent to Rio de Janeiro to a British ship. From the explanation, it appears that the Postmaster-General must have known that the mail would be left at Pernambuco, hundreds of miles inside of its destination, and that it must wait there for the coming of the United States line of ships which must take it from Pernambuco and carry it to Rio.

So all that the Postmaster-General did was to decline giving it to an American line which would have carried it through to Rio de Janeiro, and instead of that he gave it for a part of the way to an English line which was obliged to leave it at Pernambuco, where it was taken up by the American line and carried through. If any better instance can be given of preferring foreign lines to our own, I do not know it. It stands upon this explanation greatly worse than the account given by the English newspaper published in Rio.

Mr. PLUMB addressed the Senate in the conclusion of the debate. [See Appendix.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the pending proposition. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be read, and then the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to modify my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 100, of section 1, in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, it is proposed to strike out the words "American built and registered," and after the word "steamships," in line 101, to insert the words:

Officered by citizens of the United States and wholly owned by such citizens, whether such steamships are built in the United States or elsewhere.

So as to make the committee's amendment read:

For the transportation of foreign mails by steamships officered by citizens of the United States and wholly owned by such citizens, whether such steamships are built in the United States or elsewhere, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000, &c.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course I do not intend to attempt to violate any rule or understanding of the Senate. I feel aggrieved, however, by the attack which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] has made upon my State and which I think he intended for me because I had the temerity to offer an amendment to this bill. I give notice now that I will offer resolutions in the Senate to-morrow morning which will bring this subject back to the attention of the Senate, and I will do myself the honor to reply to the strictures of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EUSTIS. The Senator from Alabama consents that I should offer an amendment and have a vote taken on it before his is acted on.

Mr. PLUMB. I was about to ask the Senator from Alabama to yield until I had proposed an amendment to the amendment from the committee, so as to complete the committee's proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We might as well take it as it is.

Mr. PLUMB. I propose to offer an amendment to perfect the amendment reported. It is according to the usual rule; that is all.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection. I do not wish to put myself in the way of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there be objection, the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is withdrawn.

Mr. PLUMB. I now offer the amendment which I submitted yesterday and had printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas from the Committee on Appropriations will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 109, in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, after the word "with," it is proposed to insert the words "the owners of;" so as to read:

"And the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with the owners of such American steamships, for a term of not less than five years.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I am further instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend the amendment, in line 110, after the word "five," by inserting "nor more than ten;" so as to read:

For a term of not less than five nor more than ten years.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] desires to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment moved by the Senator from Kansas will he considered as agreed to unless objection be made.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment would not be in order to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. Can it be amended after being adopted?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not unless you strike out more with it.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Maryland wishes a modification, to which I have no personal objection, to make the term not more than five years in place of not less than five years. The committee's proposition was to make it not less than five nor more than ten. The Senator from Maryland proposes to make the contract not more than five years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That can be tested by the vote on this amendment. If a majority of the Senate want the outward limit to be ten years, as the proposition of the committee is, then they will vote for that, and it will show that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland is not in the opinion of the Senate a good one; but if they think the amendment of the Senator from Maryland is a good one they will vote down the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GORMAN. I withdraw it then for the moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee has been considered agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I supposed the question was to be taken on this in order to test the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, who does not wish the limit to be ten years but wishes the limit to be five years. If the Senate wishes the limit to be five years, it ought to vote against the amendment of the committee; and that being voted down, then the amendment of the Senator from Maryland would be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland would be in order whether the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is adopted or not, as it relates to a different clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it would make the bill absurd, because it would then read "for not more than five years nor more than ten years." So the sense of the Senate can be taken now. If the Senate does not wish to have it more than five years, it ought to vote against this and then vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLUMB. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWELL. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 110, in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, after the word "five," it is proposed to insert "nor more than ten years;" so as to read:

Such contract or contracts with the owners of such American steamships for a term of not less than five nor more than ten years.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not know that it is in order to speak, but I desire the Senate to understand the proposition.

The provision reported from the committee provides that the contract shall be made for a term of not less than five years. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas now is to make it not less than five nor more than ten years, so that if his amendment is adopted the bill will read, "for a term of not less than five nor more than ten years." The amendment that I desire to offer, when I have an opportunity, is to limit the duration of the contract to four years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe the understanding was that we might, as we always do, have short debates on amendments. It was said that general debate should close at 4 o'clock. I do not wish to violate any understanding, and if I may be permitted, therefore, I should like to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not act on the understanding of the Senate. The Senator is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but I do not wish to violate an understanding. I supposed the understanding was that the general discussion was ended, but when an amendment came up a few words might be said upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. That was the exact language of the agreement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then brief discussion is in order on amendments. I wish to say in regard to the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Maryland that when this bill was first reported I was under the impression, without having thought of it, that the period was too long, that the Postmaster-General ought to be allowed to contract for a shorter time, and that it would be better to say "not more than five years," instead of saying not less than five years; but when I came to examine the subject and to find how distant these ports are and how precarious is the business beginning there, it appeared to me that, if we are in earnest about this business at all, the Postmaster-General with the securities that he takes and has ought to be required to make an arrangement sufficiently permanent to enable people who are engaged in this traffic to build their ships and keep up their lines with the understanding that it is not going to be stopped in one year or two years or three, and that it was to be a performance that was to continue long enough to enable these shippers to see what could be done in endeavoring to open this trade and carry these mails. On these considerations I change the opinion that I first had, and have now come to the belief that it ought to stand as it is with an upward limit so that the Postmaster-General should not contract forever, but something beyond the five years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Nevada].

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is absent from the Senate by reason of sickness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If I were privileged to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. I do not see him in his seat. I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. Yesterday evening the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] upon leaving the Senate Chamber requested me to pair with him. I understood him at the time to mean for yesterday evening; but the Senator being now absent, and as he may have understood himself as providing for his absence until he goes home, I should like to ask his colleague whether he knows that he has made any arrangement other than the one he may have supposed he made with me.

Mr. BLAIR. He left the Senate Chamber and will perhaps be absent some weeks. I understood him that on political matters he was paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If this is a political question, that pair applies. As to any other arrangement, I know nothing.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I record my vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. But for that I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] having returned, I desire to vote.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] having voted, I vote "nay."

Mr. FAIR. I transfer my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD].

Mr. COCKRELL. I paired some time ago with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I see he is not here. If he were present I should vote "yea," and I presume he would vote "yea," but I will not vote as he is not here.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Miller,	Sherman,
Allison,	Evarts,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Spooner,

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama renew his amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I renew my amendment. It comes in two parts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] which the Chair neglected to state. It will be reported by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment of Mr. PLUMB to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is, at the end of line 114, to add:

And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services, he shall, so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places, respectively, in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of this bill to permit my amendment now to take precedence of his in the order of their being acted upon, because if the Senate adopt the amendment which is now proposed on behalf of the committee it directly antagonizes the amendment which I offered.

Mr. PLUMB. I will, for the purpose of enabling the vote to be taken first on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, withdraw the amendment of the committee for the time being.

Mr. MORGAN. Now the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] desires me to withdraw for a moment until he can offer an amendment. I will do so.

Mr. EUSTIS. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after line 114:

The Postmaster-General, if in his judgment it be practicable, shall contract for a semi-monthly mail service between the ports of New York and New Orleans alternately to the port of Rio de Janeiro, under the provisions of this act.

I will state that I have submitted this amendment to a majority of the Committee on Appropriations and that they have no objection to its adoption.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill as it now is provides, does it not, for the port of Rio?

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Vermont proceeding to make some explanation; but I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there was an error in his previous statement that the understanding of the Senate was that there should be debate permitted on amendments. The agreement of the Senate is very precise and clear on that subject, and it is this:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the proposition to the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asks unanimous consent of the Senate that this bill be taken up at 2 o'clock to-morrow as the unfinished business and be continued until 3, when the general debate shall terminate and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] shall have the opportunity to close it within the next hour, and that then the vote shall be taken without further debate.

Then there is a statement from the Chair that the debate on this amendment should close, the entire debate, "as this is the last amendment." Now I do not wish to object, but I hope unanimous consent will be given for the Senator to make such explanation as he desires. I do not want to have us let loose in general debate on these amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair always regards agreements made in this way as binding upon Senators, but not to be enforced by the Chair strictly, because it would be difficult to do that under the rules. It is a matter resting alone upon the honor and common understanding of Senators.

Mr. HOAR. The final statement of the Chair was that the Chair understood the full debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill to be included. I myself put to the Chair this question:

I wish to inquire for information whether the unanimous consent thus agreed to covers the whole Post-Office appropriation bill, or merely the pending provision?

There being an amendment then pending. The Chair replied:

The Chair understood the whole debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill to be included, as this is the last amendment. The whole debate is to close at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That referred to the last amendment, and here is another.

Mr. HOAR. It was an agreement as to the whole bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not remember the language the Chair used in putting the question, but I know that my request was that all general debate should be concluded at the hour of 4 o'clock upon the bill and amendments. However, I did not suppose that it would exclude a brief explanation of an amendment which was then offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The common understanding in regard to all agreements of this kind is that some latitude should be allowed to explain an amendment, but very brief.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair does not understand me as making any objection at all, but I wanted simply to preclude in the outset any suggestion of a reopening of this general discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will endeavor to enforce the agreement, but with the understanding a brief explanation or answer may be made in respect to new amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Chair to hold, as all his predecessors have done and the Senate always has done, that these agreements were not orders of the Senate which changed the rules and limited debate, but a common understanding among Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the view of the Chair, that such agreements are rather binding upon Senators than that the Chair is to enforce them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Am I authorized to go on, or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Being authorized, I do not wish to say anything, as I have got a right to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the amendment to the amendment which I have sent to the desk, and I ask that it be considered as one amendment, because it contains two propositions—in fact, three—in line with each other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read it as a whole amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we ought to take it piece by piece. It will all come to the same thing if we agree to the first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and it will be divided.

Mr. MORGAN. All right; I only made the suggestion to save time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 100 strike out the words "American built and registered," and, after the word "steamships," in line 101, insert the words "officered by citizens of the United States, and wholly owned by such citizens, whether such steamships are built in the United States or elsewhere;" so as to read:

For the transportation of foreign mails by steamships officered by citizens of the United States, and wholly owned by such citizens, whether such steamships are built in the United States or elsewhere, to secure greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The yeas and nays were ordered on my request before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have already been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] stands paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BOWEN. I am paired on this question with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON].

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I cast my vote before I knew I was paired. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Beck,	Coke,	Kenna,	Vance,
Berry,	Eustis,	Maxey,	Vest,
Blackburn,	Gray,	Morgan,	Walthall,
Butler,	Harris,	Ransom,	Whitthorne,
Camden,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.

NAYS—41.

Aldrich,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Allison,	Fair,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Frye,	Miller,	Sewell,
Brown,	Gorman,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Sherman,
Call,	Hale,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Cameron,	Harrison,	Palmer,	Teller,
Conger,	Hoar,	Payne,	Voorhees,
Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	Logan,	Plumb,
Dolph,	McMillan,	Pugh,
Edmunds,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,

ABSENT—15.

Bowen,	George,	Hearst,	Pike,
Chace,	Gibson,	Ingalls,	Stanford,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida,	Van Wyck.
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Pa.,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the Chief Clerk to report the latter clause of the amendment. My purpose, of course, is after getting it on the record not to ask for a yea-and-nay vote on it, as it fails with the other part of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 114 insert:

And the steamships so employed in such mail service shall be entitled to all the benefits of registry and enrollment under the laws of the United States as American ships, and shall be so enrolled and registered before any contract with the owners thereof for carrying the mails under this act shall become effective and operative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the amendment proposed in line 109, to strike out the word "American?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment was somewhat modified and agreed to by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To strike out the word "American?"

Mr. ALLISON. That was rejected, being included in the other amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know what we were voting on just now when the yeas and nays were taken?

Mr. PLUMB. On the first amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That included line 109?

Mr. ALLISON. That is my recollection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us find out about that.

Mr. MORGAN. That amendment was to strike out "American built and registered" and insert——

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; there were three amendments; in line 100 to strike out "American built and registered;" and after "steamships" to insert "officered," &c.; and then in line 109, after the word "with," to insert the words "the owners of," and in the same line to strike out the word "American." I wish to know just how it stands.

Mr. PLUMB. That has not been agreed to. I now offer an amendment, on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, to come in between the amendment of the committee as it now stands and the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 114, after the words "above set forth," insert:

And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services, he shall, so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places, respectively, in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment. In line 111, after the word "exceeding," I move to strike out all down to and including the word "distance," in line 112, in the following words:

For each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance.

And to insert:

Fifty cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points.

So as to read:

And at a rate of compensation not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to that amendment. That simply accomplishes the same purpose as the original text.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. There is one amendment of the committee not yet adopted on page 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment has not yet been disposed of. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. FRYE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK and others. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as amended will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what we want to hear.

Mr. BECK. There was so much confusion that I did not understand it was the amendment of the committee as amended. I do not care to have it read.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as amended will be read. The reading has been asked for by Senators on both sides of the Chamber.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as amended, as follows:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to make, after due advertisement for proposals, such contract or contracts with the owners of such American steamships, for a term of not less than five nor more than ten years, and at a rate of compensation not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points in the most direct and feasible sailing course between the terminal points, as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth. And if he shall be unable to make such contracts for any of such respective services, he shall, so far as possible, cause the mails of the United States to be carried to and from said places, respectively, in the best and most expeditious manner practicable, in American vessels and for a reasonable compensation, not exceeding the rate aforementioned. The Postmaster-General, if in his judgment it be practicable, shall contract for a semi-monthly mail service between the ports of New York and New Orleans alternately and the port of Rio de Janeiro under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. FAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], who is absent on account of sickness. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague [Mr. CHACE] is absent and is paired, as has been already announced, with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. My colleague, if present, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McPherson,	Pugh,
Allison,	Eustis,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Blair,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Brown,	Frye,	Miller,	Sewell,
Call,	Gorman,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Sherman,
Cameron,	Hale,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Conger,	Harrison,	Palmer,	Teller,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Payne,	Voorhees,
Dawes,	Logan,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dolph,	McMillan,	Plumb,

NAYS—18.

Beck,	Coke,	Maxey,	Vest,
Berry,	Gray,	Morgan,	Whitthorne,
Blackburn,	Harris,	Ransom,	Wilson of Md.
Butler,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Kenna,	Vance,

ABSENT—19.

Bowen,	George,	Ingalls,	Riddleberger,
Chace,	Gibson,	Jones of Florida,	Stanford,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Jones of Nevada,	Van Wyck,
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Walthall.
Fair,	Hearst,	Pike,

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now offer the amendment on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations which is found on page 3. I offer it as reported from the committee, except the words following the word "steamships," in line 55, which I move to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to strike out from the amendment of the committee the words which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 55, after the word "steamships," in the amendment of the committee, strike out the words "at a rate not to exceed 50 cents per nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended. It will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 47, after the word "dollars," insert the words:

The Postmaster-General is authorized to contract for inland and foreign steamboat mail service, when it can be combined in one route, where the foreign office or offices are not more than 200 miles distant from the domestic office, on the same terms and conditions as inland steamboat service, and pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland steamboat service; said contracts to be made with and performed by American built and registered steamships.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether there would be now any limitation on the amount that the Postmaster-General might pay for this foreign steamboat service, or inland either, having stricken out the 50 cents a mile clause?

Mr. PLUMB. There is none whatever. It stands upon the same footing as the regular inland and coastwise service of the United States, the amendment with that portion stricken out being the same as the law now is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then there is no limit now on inland steamers at all?

Mr. PLUMB. There is no limit at all. The Postmaster-General said that the amount named might not be large enough to enable the Department to make the contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move in line 66 to insert the word "eighty" before the words "eight thousand;" so as to read:

Railway post-office car service, $1,880,000.

I offer the amendment because of the fact that the Senate the other day passed a bill, on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], coming from the Post-Office Committee, which increases the amount of money necessary for the rendition of the railway post-office car service by about $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. PUGH. In line 47, before the word "five," I move to strike out "seventy" and insert "eighty;" so as to read:

Inland transportation by steamboat routes, $585,000.

Instead of $575,000. And after the word "dollars," in the same line, I move to add:

Of which $10,000, or so much as may be necessary, shall be used in payment for transporting a semi-weekly mail on the Alabama River between Mobile and Selma, Ala.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. The facts upon which I ask that the amendment be adopted are stated by another, and for the truth of which I vouch.

The United States census of 1880 gives the population of the counties bordering on the Alabama River between Mobile and Selma at 203,154, probably 250,000 now. All of that population is more or less accommodated by the steamboat service and directly or indirectly interested in the river mail transportation.

The distance from Mobile to Selma by the Alabama River is 310 miles.

At present there are some eight or ten post-offices on either side of the river supposed to be supplied by star or land mail service, when the weather is favorable, but in a rainy season or at high water the service is irregular, uncertain, and comparatively worthless, and the steamboats are obliged to carry the mails from one office to another on opposite sides of the river to prevent their being sent many miles around, or causing great delay in their delivery. Business men and people who desire early and prompt delivery of their letters do not rely upon that service.

Between Mobile and Selma are one hundred and twenty-five regular steamboat landings and over one hundred irregular landings, which are virtually post-offices without a postmaster. At every landing a greater or less number of letters in Government stamped envelopes are received and delivered by steamboats, for which the Government receives the postage and the steamboats receive no compensation. From one thousand five hundred to two thousand such letters are handled weekly, a large proportion of which do not relate to the boat's cargo, but are sent on account of the certainty of their early delivery.

Four times the quantity of mail matter is carried on the steamboats that is delivered to the regular river post-offices by the star service, not only through letters, but letters from one landing to another, for which it would be impossible for the steamboat owners to collect pay under section 3977 of the Revised Statutes, even if they desired to do so.

The postmasters themselves on the Alabama River send their personal and important letters by the steamboats, and lawyers and business men frequently send their letters several miles and past the star-route post-offices to the steamboats as a more reliable conveyance.

If the steamboat mail service was restored on the Alabama River numerous post-offices would be established at the more important landings, thereby accommodating a large population with letter and newspaper mails.

Petitions representing at least two hundred and fifty thousand people have been filed in the Post-Office Department asking for that steamboat mail service.

I have heretofore stated these facts to the Senator from Kansas, and I apprehend that he will make no objection to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the amendment increases the appropriation and is for a new object not stated in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The amendment is not in order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend the title of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to reserve the general amendment beginning in line 47 on page 3 in order that I may move a mere verbal amendment to make it a little more clear in regard to requiring the Postmaster-General to advertise, so as to have competition for that service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be reserved.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] desires to offer an amendment to one of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Maryland allow us to finish the amendment on page 3, which is not the one he is referring to, I suppose?

Mr. GORMAN. I will. I desire to have the amendment beginning in line 100 reserved for a separate vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that course will be taken, and that amendment will also be reserved. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committe of the Whole which have not been reserved.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the amendment on page 3 I move to insert, in line 48, after the word "authorized," the words "after due advertisement." It is somewhat doubtful when you read along down whether in this new service, foreign and domestic, not exceeding 200 miles, the Postmaster-General would be required, as he would for the inland service alone, to advertise for proposals, so as to have competition; and this will clear up the doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 48, after the word "authorized," insert "after due advertisement;" so as to read:

The Postmaster-General is authorized, after due advertisement, to contract for inland and foreign steamboat mail service, &c.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no objection to that, although the provision without it has already received that construction by the Department. So the effect of the provision is as it will be when amended.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. GORMAN. In line 110, in the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, after the word "than," I move to strike out the words "five nor more than ten," and insert "three years nor more than five;" so as to read:

For a term of not less than three years nor more than five years.

As a limitation on the duration of contracts for foreign mail service.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In line 106, after the word "Japan," I move to insert—

And to any other countries between which and the United States lines of steamships shall be established.

So as to read:

For the transportation of foreign mails by American built and registered steamships, to secure the greater frequency and regularity in dispatch, and a greater speed in the carriage of such mails to Brazil; the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America; the Sandwich, West India, and Windward Islands; New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies; China and Japan, and to any other countries between which and the United States lines of steamship shall be established, $800,000.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say, in regard to that amendment, that it brings up the question of service between New York and Liverpool. It has been the design of the committee to leave that out entirely, as a field into which we did not care, at the present stage, to go. I hope, therefore, that the amendment to the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. MORGAN. I have always had a great interest in trying to get some steamship communication between Liberia and New Orleans and Charleston, and I thought perhaps the negroes of the South who intend, I am told, to build up lines of steamships and have got the money to do it with, should have the opportunity of putting their ships under mail contracts.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator can insert Liberia if he wishes.

Mr. MORGAN. I would as soon have the white as the black. If the Senator from Kansas prefers the black, I would rather mix them.

Mr. PLUMB. I am following simply the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the amendment to the amendment be read again.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 106, after the word "Japan," insert the words:

And to any other countries between which and the United States lines of steamships shall be established.

Mr. HALE. Is an amendment to that amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, the committee's amendment has been agreed to and it is therefore part of the text of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Therefore it is a part of the text and it can only be amended by addition; and the Senator from Alabama being aware of that apparently, has merely moved to add words, just as if it were the text of the bill and would be open to amendment in that way.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to strike out all of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama after the word "to" and to insert "Liberia."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the proposed amendment, after the word "to," strike out "any other countries between which and the United States lines of steamship shall be established" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Liberia."

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that he had better put in "Africa" in place of "Liberia," because we do not know exactly where we may want to land there. We might go up the Congo, or around to Madagascar, or up the Nile.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to let it go that way.

Mr. MORGAN. That is better than nothing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to state that on this question and all other questions during the day I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 5, nays 49; as follows:

YEAS—5.

Butler,	Morgan,	Vance,	Vest.
Jones of Arkansas,

NAYS—49.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Allison,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Beck,	Eustis,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Berry,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Blair,	Fair,	Maxey,	Sherman,
Brown,	Frye,	Miller,	Spooner,
Call,	Gorman,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Camden,	Hale,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Cameron,	Harris,	Palmer,	Walthall,
Coke,	Harrison,	Payne,	Whitthorne.
Conger,	Hoar,	Platt,
Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Dawes,	Kenna,	Pugh,

ABSENT—22.

Blackburn,	Gibson,	Jones of Florida,	Stanford,
Bowen,	Gray,	Manderson,	Van Wyck,
Chace,	Hampton,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Wilson of Iowa,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Pike,	Wilson of Md.
Colquitt,	Hearst,	Ransom,
George,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendments the question is on ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. PUGH. Is the bill in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is on its third reading.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to renew the amendment I offered as in Committee of the Whole if in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator offered his amendment when the bill was in the Senate, the Chair understands.

Mr. PUGH. I thought it was offered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. PUGH. Is it in order for me to offer the latter part of the amendment which I offered before, leaving out the increase of the amount?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the amendment read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 47, after the word "dollars," insert:

Of which $10,000, or so much as may be necessary, shall be used in payment for transporting a semi-weekly mail on the Alabama River between Mobile and Selma, Ala.

So as to read:

Inland transportation by steamboat routes, $575,000; of which $10,000, or so much as may be necessary, shall be used in payment for transporting a semi-weekly mail on the Alabama River between Mobile and Selma, Ala.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that amendment in order? It increases the estimate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it introduces a new item of appropriation, although it does not increase the amount.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in excess of the estimate of the Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no estimate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a new item.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is clearly out of order, there being no estimate of the Department, and it is a new item of appropriations.

Mr. PUGH. I should like very much if the Senate would allow it to pass by unanimous consent. ["No!" "No!"]

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired on all these questions with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. He would vote "yea" if he were here, and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HEARST (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague, the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD].

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 44, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—44.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,
Allison,	Dolph,	Logan,	Ransom,
Beck,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Eustis,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Brown,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Butler,	Fair,	Miller,	Sewell,
Call,	Frye,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Camden,	Gorman,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Cameron,	Hale,	Payne,	Teller,
Conger,	Harrison,	Platt,	Voorhees,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Walthall.

NAYS—10.

Berry,	Harris,	Maxey,	Whitthorne.
Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,

Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Pike,
George,	Jones of Florida,	Stanford,

So the bill was passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company of Texas to maintain a bridge across Red River.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the interstate-commerce bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to offer a resolution that it may be printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the motion for a moment.

MAIL AND COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk; and I ask that they be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama desire to have them read?

Mr. MORGAN. Let them be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not printed in the RECORD, but printed as a document.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to have them read then. I ask for the reading of the resolutions; they are brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress to extend all necessary mail facilities across the seas to the principal ports of all foreign countries with which the people of the United States have any considerable trade, or where trade can be profitably developed.

2. That it is the duty of Congress so to provide by law that the American people shall have the right to buy ships and import them from foreign countries under reasonable customs duties, as a means of conducting and promoting commerce, and for carrying the mails to and from foreign ports.

3. That the laws which prohibit the importation of foreign-built ships are as unjust and as unwise as laws would be that would prohibit the importation into the United States of all other goods or articles of foreign manufacture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 5, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions.

There was no objection.

The Journal was read as indicated, and was approved.

LEGATION PREMISES AT TOKIO, JAPAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State asking an appropriation to pay annual rental of the legation premises at Tokio, Japan, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, ETC., OF WAR DEPARTMENT.

DEFENDING SUITS AGAINST UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Assistant Attorney-General, asking an increase in the appropriation for defending suits in claims against the United States for the next fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation for the protection and improvement of Hot Springs, Ark., for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MAJ. D. C. POOLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting letter from Maj. D. C. Poole, Paymaster, United States Army, with statement showing excess of expenses over mileage, while traveling under order, from November, 1882, to March, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary oft he Interior, transmitting supplementary report from the surveyor-general of New Mexico upon the private land claim of Bernado de Miera y Pacheco and Pedro Padilla, No. 98; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

To Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, for five days, on account of important business.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 3, 1886.

Whereas a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, approved July 5, 1884, directed the printing of 50,000 copies of the first annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry, 10,000 copies of which were for the use of the Senate, and 35,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas it is stated that only 2,000 copies of said report have been delivered to the Senate, and only 285 have been delivered to the House of Representatives, and that no delivery has been made to either branch for about a year: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the cause of this delay and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask unanimous consent to the adoption of the resolution. This is a matter in which the whole House is interested, and the consideration of it will consume but little time.

Mr. HALL. I object.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HALL. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MORGAN. If the report is responsive, that is all that is desired.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] simply reports back the resolution for action by the House so that the Committee on Printing may proceed to make the inquiry which the resolution directs. Is there objection to the adoption of the resolution?

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the reso- bill was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 3, 1886.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House of Representatives the special intelligence report on the progress of the Panama Canal during the year 1885, made to the Navy Department by Lieut. W. W. Kimball and Naval Cadet W. L. Capp, United States Navy.

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the resolution herewith submitted, after consideration thereof, report the same back with a favorable recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAMPBELL VS. WEAVER.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the contested-election case of Campbell vs. Weaver.

Mr. WILLIS. I propose to raise the question of consideration. I hope my friend will not press that case to-day.

Mr. HALL. I trust the gentleman from Kentucky will not raise the question of consideration. I think we can get this case out of his way in an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Frank T. Campbell was not elected to a seat in the Forty-ninth Congress as a member from the sixth Congressional district of the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That James B. Weaver was elected and is entitled to retain his seat in the Forty-ninth Congress as a member from the sixth Congressional district of the State of Iowa.

Mr. BRAGG. Is this the regular order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. This is a matter of privilege; but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] raises the question of consideration.

Mr. BRAGG. I was about to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. That question has been raised already by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] will not insist. I do not think it will take five minutes to dispose of this case. I think there is nobody here who believes that Mr. Weaver was not elected.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman is willing that at the end of five minutes the case shall be laid aside, I will accept his suggestion.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the minority of the committee desire to debate this case, and I do not think it can be done in five minutes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What do you want to talk about the case for?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If it is decided that the House shall not proceed with the consideration of this privileged matter, will the two morning hours then take their accustomed place?

The SPEAKER. They will, and the morning hour will follow unless dispensed with, even though the House should consider this matter, provided its consideration is concluded to-day.

Mr. BRAGG. I think that the Chair, in saying that the two morning hours would follow, has overlooked the special order for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not say two morning hours, because there is only one morning hour under the rules of the House.

Mr. BRAGG. I understood the Chair to speak of two. The special order for to-day is the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. The question now is on proceeding with the consideration of the report from the Committee on Elections.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 62.

Mr. WILLIS demanded tellers, but withdrew the demand.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the House determines to proceed with the consideration of the report.

Mr. HALL. I desire to inquire of the gentlemen constituting the minority of the committee how much time they desire for the consideration of this question.

Mr. PAYNE. When this matter was first brought up, it was suggested by gentlemen of the minority of the committee that two hours should be occupied on each side; but we are now willing to consent to one hour on each side, making two hours for the entire discussion of the case.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL] that he let the gentlemen on the other side discuss the question, and then let us vote.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay before the House briefly and succinctly——

Mr. REAGAN. Is there any understanding as to the time to be occupied by this case?

Mr. HALL. I am perfectly willing to agree that an hour be occupied on each side. I ask unanimous consent that the time for the consideration of this case be limited to two hours, one hour on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of two hours from the beginning of the debate the debate be closed, one hour to be occupied on each side. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay before the House the facts involved in this contest. The district is composed of seven counties. The contestee was returned as elected by a majority of 67 votes; and the contestant now charges as the basis of his claim that 81 illegal votes were cast for the contestee by persons incompetent as electors, and that there were some errors in the count, amounting to perhaps half a dozen more. He also claims that in the township of Oskaloosa, in Mahaska County, there were 150 ballots received from electors in violation of the registry law of the State of Iowa, and that 60 other votes were cast in violation of the same law in the township of Ottumwa. The contestee, denying all these allegations, responds by charging that there were some 50 illegal votes cast for the contestant; that some of the persons casting these votes were bribed and others were colonized from adjacent regions of the country for the purpose of casting their illegal votes and defeating the election of the contestee.

The committee has given careful examination to the evidence directed to each of these hundred or more individual ballots, and has seen proper to exclude from the vote of the contestee 16 ballots as having been illegal, and from the vote of the contestant some 35 ballots as having been illegal; so that the determination of the committee with reference to the individual ballots is insufficient to effect any change of the result and gives the contestee an increased majority. I think I may safely say, even in view of the position taken by the minority, that the sole question involved in the contest relates to the affidavits upon which more than 200 voters were allowed to vote in the precincts of Oscaloosa and Ottumwa. This is purely a legal question and depends upon the proper construction of the registry law of the State of Iowa. It involves the question whether that law is mandatory or only directory.

The facts are that in the precinct of Oskaloosa, where the registry board was Republican, the evidence discloses very clearly that there was an attempt to manipulate improperly the registry-list for the purpose of depriving Democratic electors of the precinct of the usual convenient method of depositing their ballots, and of putting them to the trouble and uncertainty of preparing the necessary affidavits. The evidence is uncontradicted that out of a voting population of 800, 25 per cent., nearly all of them Democrats, were purposely left off the registry-list. Men who had voted there for years, old and reputable citizens, were omitted, and on the day of the election were so indignant and humiliated at the neglect and impropriety involved in their being left off the list that they absolutely abstained from voting. But about 150 of those electors undertook to prepare the necessary affidavits; and 103 of them in assigning the reason required by the statute for their names not appearing upon the registry-list gave "neglect" and "left off the registry-list" as those causes. There were thirty-one affidavits—not enough, however, to change the result of the election—in which the blank left for filling out the cause for being omitted from the registry-list was not filled out by the elector. It is upon these thirty-one affidavits, in which the cause for not being registered was not set forth, and upon the one hundred and three in which the word "neglect" or the other words "left off the registry-list" were inserted, that the contestant grounds his claim to the seat of the present incumbent in this House.

Without attempting to discuss the question at this time, or to dwell upon its consideration, I will state that the majority of the committee came to the conclusion that the statute of Iowa, in so far as it directs what the affidavit shall contain and what the elector shall state as the reason for having been omitted from the registry-list, is purely directory. It is a matter that directs itself to the discretion of the judges of election whether they shall receive or reject the vote of the elector; and those judges having, upon full and fair inspection of the affidavit, declared it to be sufficient, that is conclusive and admits the vote; and there is no power that can review or reconsider that question, that after the vote has been received for all purposes of a contest the question presented must be, not whether the elector was registered or his affidavit competent, but whether he was in fact a legally qualified and competent elector.

I desire to say in this connection that there is no pretense that a single one of these citizens, who were thus improperly omitted from the register, and have thus sought to exercise their right of ballot, were not legal and qualified electors; and it is the barest and most complete technicality, in my judgment, that was ever made the basis of such a claim either in a court or a legislative body.

I now yield the floor to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN], my colleague on the committee, reserving the remainder of my time.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it is conceded that this case turns upon the disposition that is to be made of the ballots of the unregistered electors cast in this district. It is not denied that every one of these voters was a duly qualified elector under the constitution of the State of Iowa.

The votes were received by the judges of election; they were counted and properly returned; and it is now gravely suggested by the minority of the committee that the right of the sitting member to his seat shall be denied, and the contestant given the seat, by striking from the returns of the sitting member the votes of these duly qualified electors, cast in this manner and duly returned for him. This extraordinary proceeding is sought to be enforced because it is claimed that the election law of Iowa has not been strictly pursued.

The code of Iowa provides for a board of registry, composed of the trustees of the township and the clerk, and it is made the duty of that board, thus composed, to make a register of all qualified voters in that township. They are to make this list from the assessor's books, from the former poll-lists, and from any legal evidence at their command; but it is their duty to see that every and all duly qualified voters are registered upon that list. After it has been completed it is to be exposed for inspection as provided in the statute, and it is then made the duty of the board, one week before the election, to meet for the purpose of revising and correcting the list. But the law provides that no name shall be added to the list within five days of the election; there are in most cases, therefore, but two days given for the adding of names to the list.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the law provides that no man shall vote whose name is not upon the register, unless at the day of the election he furnishes certain evidence to the judges. The failure to register does not disfranchise the citizen. It was not the intention of the law of Iowa, as it is in some other States, to disfranchise a man if his name is not put upon the register, but it makes a provision for the reception of the vote even if his name is not placed there originally by the board or afterwards by correction. These provisions are, in substance, as follows, that when the voter offers to cast his ballot he shall furnish to the judges of election his affidavit that he is a duly qualified voter, and the affidavit of at least one other person establishing the fact that he resides in the district, and also, in the words of the statute, shall also furnish to the judges a satisfactory reason for not appearing before the board at the time of the correction of the register.

Now, this provision is twofold in character: It provides that the voter, although not registered, may vote if he produces evidence on the day of the election that he is a qualified voter, including the question of his residence; and also another point that he shall give an excuse to the judges of election why he did not appear and have his name placed upon the register. Why, Mr. Speaker, the merest glance at the provisions of the statute shows that one of these provisions is a matter of substance, the other is not; that he shall be required under oath to show that he is a qualified voter is right and proper, because as his name is not upon the register the presumption is that he is not a duly qualified voter, and hence it is right and proper that he should make that proof; but as to the other provision, what is it? Simply an excuse to be furnished the judges showing why he did not appear and have his name placed upon the register.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to go into the discussion as to whether the statute of Iowa in this respect is mandatory or directory. I do not propose to go into the discussion of the question as to what would be the effect if no affidavit had been presented at all, because in this case the affidavits were presented, and there is no pretense but that the affidavits showed these men to be qualified voters, and the only proposition is that these affidavits do not show a sufficient excuse why these men did not go before the board the day the register was corrected and have their names placed upon it.

Mr. McMILLIN. And that was not required by the law.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I take the ground that it was not required by law that the reason be included in the affidavit. That excuse might be otherwise furnished to those judges. But the law makes the election board the sole judges of the sufficiency of the excuse; and when they have passed on the question that is an end of it. They are public officers charged with judicial functions to settle the existence of a fact on testimony which is satisfactory to them; and their judgment can not be attacked or impeached or questioned in any collateral proceeding as this is. For these reasons the majority of the committee respectfully submit that no ground for unseating the sitting member has been shown by the evidence.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I take the floor in my own right, and reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. There is but one hour allowed for debate on each side. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL] was recognized and reserved the remainder of his time.

Mr. HALL. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky what time he desires.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I suppose the other side will now be heard.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope I shall have the attention of the House in the discussion of this case, as it seems to be assumed by some members of the committee that there is only one side to it. I hope that no member will either stop his ears or go off to the cloak-room for fear that he shall hear some argument advanced that will prevent him from voting according to his party dictates; but that on the other hand we may have a free, fair, and frank discussion of this question of law, and decide it judicially, according to the settled precedents of law and according to the statutes of Iowa; that we may indeed fulfill our functions as the judges of the election of our members.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the one important question in this case is a question of law, and if the majority of the committee had brought no other question into this case, I should confine myself entirely to the discussion of that question. But it is charged by the majority in their report that there was colonization of voters in this district. And yet the record is barren of any evidence of colonization of voters. It is true there is some hearsay that nine negroes were brought from some other part of the State, or were working in a mine in that district in the county or precinct where they voted; and it is does not appear very clearly from the evidence which is the correct statement. But it appears that three out of that band of nine negroes voted at one of these polls, and from this fact the majority of the committee jump to the conclusion that there was a colonization of nine illegal voters; a conclusion founded not upon the evidence, but upon hearsay in the case. But I pass that, Mr. Speaker.

Then it appears that in Oskaloosa Township there were a number of unregistered persons who voted at the election. The majority of the committee claim that there is some sort of fraud because one hundred or one hundred and fifty of those not on register were Democrats or Greenbackers. And yet it appears incontestably from the evidence that the law was followed out by the officers having in charge the register of voters in Oskaloosa Township; and we might as well come first to the statute of the State of Iowa for the registration of voters applicable to this township of Oskaloosa.

It is provided that the assessors shall make an annual assessment of the township, and at every annual assessment they shall prepare a list of the legal voters in the township. Then section 596 says:

The register of elections shall contain the names of the voters at full length, alphabetically arranged, with residence set opposite. It shall be made from the assessor-list, and the poll-books of the previous election, and shall be kept by the township clerk, and shall at all times be open to inspection at his office without charge. He shall also, within two days after the adjournment of the board, post up a certified copy thereof in a conspicuous place in his office, or in such other place as the board may direct.

Now, Mr. Speaker, although there are seven or eight hundred pages of printed testimony in this record, there is not word of proof in that printed testimony that the registers of this election did not meet at the time and place designated and prepare this registered list. There is not a word to show that they left off a single name either from the assessor's list or from the poll-list of the previous election. There is some gratuitous reflection on these registers on the part of the majority of the committee, inspired by the brief of the counsel of the contestee; but there is not a scintilla of evidence in the case that every voter's name, both on the assessment-list and on the poll-list of the preceding election, did not appear upon this registry-list made for 1884. So there is no room for any criticism of the board of registry. There was some criticism in the case, and I think in the majority report also, that this registry-list at the time of the meeting for correction was found somewhere in a hardware store, in Kendig's hardware store, I believe. Well, Mr. Speaker, that was entirely in accordance with the statute of the State of Iowa. Section 597 provides:

The board of registry shall hold a meeting at the place where the last general election was held; or if from any cause it can not be held at such place, then at some place to be designated by notice to be published in at least one paper printed in the township or posted in at least three public places therein, on the Tuesday preceding the general election of each year, at which they shall revise, correct, and complete the register of elections, and shall hear any evidence that may be brought before them in reference to such electors.

It provides the number of days they may sit, what shall be done, and what proof shall be required before they put any person's name upon the registry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, they had that meeting. They had it at the place designated by the registers, as they might designate it under the law. I refer to the evidence first of Mr. Kendig, who was one of the trustees:

Q. 16. As such trustee, are you a member of board of registration of voters?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. 17. Did you assist in preparing a registry-list of voters for Oskaloosa Township for November election, 1884, for such township?
A. I did.
Q. 18. Was said list made up as required by law?
A. Yes, sir; it was.

There is no dispute about that evidence.

Q. 19. Was the name of any voter left off the registry-list intentionally by the board of registration?
A. No.

Then at page 281 of the record is the testimony of Mr. John F. Gunn, from which I read:

Q. Didn't you have the register and examine it away from the township clerk's office last fall?
A. I didn't have it away. I did examine it at H. R. Kendig's hardware store, at the place where the township board, the trustees, and the township clerk met for the purpose of correcting the register.
Q. You are not a member of the board, or township clerk?
A. No, sir.
Q. How many of the board were present at that meeting?
A. They were all there part of the time and two of them the rest of the time.
Q. Was the clerk there?
A. Yes, sir.

He goes on to name some of the parties who were there. His testimony also shows that the Republicans in Oskaloosa Township were vigilant on the days for the correction of the registry; that they sent out after their voters and had them come in and qualify themselves and get their names on the registry-list, and that the Democratic party and the Greenback party were less vigilant and did not send out after their voters. There is something stated in the majority report about a number of names of old residents being left off the list, but one of the witnesses states (I have not time now to refer to his testimony) that there were only fifteen or twenty names of old residents left off the list, and that those were about equally divided between the parties. In regard to the other 150 voters left off (or whatever the number may have been) it does not appear but what they were voters of a transient character, coming and going. The report of the majority stated that 200 voters were left off this list, while there were only 800 qualified voters altogether; but I have before me the census of Iowa, taken in 1885, less than a year after this election, by which it appears that in that township there were 1,718 legally qualified voters in June or July, 1885. Now, out of those 1,718, 150 were left off, and of those 150 only 15 or 20 were old resident voters. Mr. Speaker and members of this House who live in cities where registry laws are in force, did you ever attend a poll, no matter how faithfully those laws were carried out, no matter how intelligent or how energetic the officers of election and of registration were—did you ever see a poll where there was not a greater percentage of names of old voters left off than 15 or 20 out of 1,700—the names of men who were temporarily absent? But it is left for the majority of the committee to make a fling at these registers of election, because it appears that this number of old voters and 150 other voters not classified were left off the list.

And now, Mr. Speaker, as to the law governing this case—because I believe that the law should be maintained in election cases. Among the most important parts of the modern machinery for the protection of the purity of the ballot-box are these registry laws. We have felt that in my own State, for it is not a great many years since in the city of New York in some election precincts there were piled up and counted and returned, so as to actually affect the election, more votes than there were men, women, and children—yes, even more than there were cats and dogs—in those particular election districts. It was then that the people became aroused, because they saw that such abuses were striking at the very foundation of our Government, striking at the freedom and the purity of the ballot-box. The people became aroused, and these registry laws were invented and enacted as safeguards for the purity and honesty of elections. And higher than any man's right to sit in this body, higher than any question that comes before this Congress, is the question of maintaining those laws in their purity and simplicity, and carrying them out faithfully to their full extent. The gentleman who opened the debate on the other side said that the question in this case was: Is the law mandatory, or is it directory? That is the question in this case, Mr. Speaker, because if the law is mandatory, then enough of the votes for Weaver were cast by men who were not registered in Oskaloosa Township, and who did not comply with the mandatory requirements of the law, to overturn the election and to award the seat to Campbell. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that every mind is reluctant to come to the conclusion that a voter, otherwise qualified, should be disfranchised because his name is not on the registry-list, or because he has not complied with the law by getting his name on the list. I am aware of that, because that question met me in the case at the outset, and I never would have made a minority report in this case, I never would have signed a minority report, did I not believe that, acting judicially, it was my duty to interpret this law as mandatory, and to throw out the 134 votes that were cast in disregard of the law.

First, then, as to the provision of the statute. I read from section 618 of the Iowa Statutes:

> The judges in election precincts where the registry law is in force shall designate one of their number to check on the register the name of every person voting; and no vote shall be received from any person whose name does not appear there, unless he shall furnish the judges an affidavit showing that he is a qualified elector, and a sufficient reason for not appearing before the board on the day for correcting the register.

Mark the language, Mr. Speaker: No vote shall be received from any person whose name is not on the register, unless he shall show by affidavit that he is a qualified voter, and shall give a sufficient reason for not appearing before the board on the day for correcting the register.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how is it in this case? Thirty-one of these men came up and furnished affidavits covering the qualifications of the voter, but stating no reason under the sun for not appearing before the registry board. One hundred and three more stated in their affidavits that the reason their names were not on the registry was—"left off the registry!" The statute says they must give a sufficient reason for not appearing before the board; and these one hundred and three men give a reason why they should have appeared before the board—"left off the registry!" That is not a reason for not appearing, but is a reason why they should have appeared.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Does the statute state who shall be the judge of the sufficfency of the reason?

Mr. PAYNE. The statute does not state who shall be the judge.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Did these men who were not registered vote? Were their votes received?

Mr. PAYNE. Their votes were received. It appears they were all Democrats and Greenbackers; and the majority of the committee concede substantially in their report that they all voted for the sitting member—every one of them.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. How did it occur that these men were permitted to vote if the law disqualified them? Why did the judges receive their votes?

Mr. PAYNE. That is a question for the judges to answer, not for me.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is it not to be presumed that the judges passed upon the reasons?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if a man presents in his affidavit any reason, however frivolous—if it can be called a reason, and the judges of election pass upon that reason, I will not argue as to whether the vote of a person presenting such an affidavit should be thrown out or not. But my position is, that where the person presents an affidavit stating as a reason for not appearing something which is no reason, which does not give the judges of election any opportunity to exercise their judicial functions, if they have any, which does not give them jurisdiction of the question, in that case I say the vote should be thrown out.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question? Does not the statute provide that on the day of election an affidavit shall be made and furnished to the officers of election showing that the person is a qualified voter, and in addition to the affidavit he may offer to the judges the reason why he was not properly registered?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman can not stand upon any such construction of the statute. It provides that—

> No vote shall be received from any person whose name does not appear there—

That is, on the registry-list—

> unless he shall furnish the judges his affidavit showing that he is a qualified elector, and a sufficient reason for not appearing before the board on the day for correcting the registry.

Mr. SOWDEN. To whom is the reason to be furnished?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Suppose, in point of fact, an old resident, known to the judges, should appear and offer to vote and they should waive the making of the affidavit; as I understand, the additional reason need not be in the form of an affidavit. Is that correct?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; not at all. The statute is mandatory upon both points. It requires that the person offering the vote shall furnish an affidavit showing that he is a qualified elector, and also a sufficient reason for not appearing.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Who is to be the judge of the sufficiency of the reason?

Mr. PAYNE. In the first place, the affidavit must show that the person is a qualified elector, and it must also show a sufficient reason for not appearing.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Sufficient for whom?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, concede for the sake of an argument, sufficient for the inspectors of election. What then follows? In reviewing it, what are we to say? Are we to review their discretion?

Mr. SOWDEN. How can you go back of their decision?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not desire to go back of their discretion. What I say is that the person offering to vote must furnish a reason, frivolous or otherwise.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But the judges having passed on that reason and having decided it sufficient by receiving the vote, are we to go back and re-examine the question?

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose in the affidavit there was not anything constituting a reason.

Mr. LONG. Then the judges would not accept it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. We are bound to presume the judges would not accept the vote in such a case.

Mr. PAYNE. But here you have the affidavit, and it contains no reason.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But the judges held it contained a sufficient reason, because they received the vote. You say it does not.

Mr. TURNER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will not insist that the cases where in the affidavit there was an entire omission of the reason are sufficient to change the result of the election.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope I may not be misunderstood about that matter. In the first place, 31 votes were received upon affidavits which stated no reason whatever; and I presume that the majority of the committee, including the chairman, would concede that those 31 votes should be thrown out. It is said we can not go back of the decision of the judges of election who received those votes. Still, does not the statute of Iowa make it a prime requisite for the receipt of the votes that the person offering to vote shall furnish a reason. In this case they furnished none. But that is not sufficient to change the result. Now, in the case of the other one hundred and three affidavits the parties say that the reason their names are not on the registry is because they are "left off the registry." The statute says that they must show not a reason why their names are left off the registry, but a reason for not appearing on the day of correcting the registry. Now, if these men in their affidavits state anything in the nature of a reason for not appearing on the day for the correction of the registry, they say the reason they did not appear at that time was—"left off the registry."

Now, I say that is no more a reason than the other, where there is not a word of reason interpolated in the affidavit.

Mr. SOWDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYNE. My time is running on rapidly and I can not yield further.

Mr. SOWDEN. One more question and then I am done.

Mr. PAYNE. Very well.

Mr. SOWDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the affidavits were made by proper freeholders bearing testimony to the qualifications of those who voted?

Mr. PAYNE. There was no question made about freeholders.

Mr. SOWDEN. They made those affidavits.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope, Mr. Speaker, I am understood in this, that the affidavits stated first a reason for that—stated not the reason for not appearing on the day of correction, but why they were left off the registry. What I claim for that is, that it is not only not the reason for not appearing at that correction, but it is the highest reason why they should have appeared at that time to correct it if their names were off the registry. That was the strongest reason for them to appear and have their names put upon the registry. And the affidavit in that respect is just as bad and just as much a failure as where the reason is left blank in these affidavits.

Now as to the mandatory character of this law. In the first place, the supreme court of Iowa has decided in two cases this law is mandatory and must be obeyed. Why, Mr. Speaker, the very language of the act itself, a negative statute, that no vote shall be received unless these conditions are complied with, is mandatory in its character. I find but one court, but one decision in all the United States where the mandatory character of this act or a similar act has ever been questioned, save in the minority report of this House signed by three members. But one decision by one court found in two cases, and even there in the State of Illinois, in a previous decision four out of the seven judges who rendered the latter decision, uniting in the first decision, decided that act identical with the statute of Iowa is mandatory in its character. They say the words are so plain they are not capable of any other judicial construction. The mandatory character of such a statute has never been denied, to my knowledge, save by this court of Illinois. Since the time when the Ten Commandments were delivered to Moses "thou shalt not" has been interpreted always as mandatory and not directory.

Mr. LOWRY. Will the gentleman permit me to propound a question in connection with that decision? Is it not the fact that the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin has decided similar legislation under their constitution was unconstitutional? And whether it has not been requisite in that State to get a constitutional provision authorizing the enactment of such a law?

Mr. PAYNE. On the contrary, the supreme court in Wisconsin (in 21 Wisconsin)—I have not the case before me, but it is the case of Doerflinger against Helmantel—a case quoted at length in the minority report—has decided this law is mandatory in its character, and that an election held in contravention of its terms, receiving votes without the affidavit required by the statute, was void. They not only held that in 21 Wisconsin, but they held it in another decision in 19 Wisconsin.

Mr. TURNER. Pardon me an inquiry as to the character of these authorities. Did they hold the question as to whether or not full compliance with the law required the affidavit as necessary, or was it merely as to a matter of administration they differed?

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman's question. Mr. Speaker, I think all those cases, with the exception of 65 Illinois, which I will refer to more at length——

Mr. ROWELL. And 88 Illinois.

Mr. PAYNE. Are founded upon the case where there was no affidavit, I think. Eighty-eight and 78 Illinois put it upon the ground the voter did not know himself but that he was registered and went up to the election officer and offered his vote and it was received, and he not knowing that his name was not upon the registry he had no opportunity to make affidavit. Every one of them, I think, is distinct from this case in that the voter himself had no means of knowing that his name was not upon the register; an entirely different case from this in that respect, as it is also different in this, that every requirement of this mandatory statute had to be obeyed in order to get their vote in.

In the present case but one single but still a substantial requirement of the mandatory statute is left out; but if a single provision of a mandatory statute is left out the effect is just the same as if every provision of the statute had been omitted. The effect is precisely the same as if the entire statute had been disregarded.

Mr. TURNER. Then I understand the gentleman means simply to challenge the administration of the law by the judges? I ask if that is not essentially a directory matter?

Mr. PAYNE. Not at all, Mr. Speaker; that is just the point I am making. The law provides certain methods of proceeding at an election to determine the qualification of a voter whose name is not upon the registry list. The law means and must mean that the registry provision of the statute shall not be a farce, that men can disregard it to attend to other business until at the time of the election; but it means that the law should be a notice and the register should be a notice to the legally qualified voters at each precinct and that they shall know, at least five days preceding an election, all that is necessary for them to know as to the status of those who claim to be voters within the precinct. But if you allow men without excuse to fail to register on the day when the registers must meet to revise it, and then to come in on the day of election and make an affidavit furnishing no excuse for not appearing on the previous day, then you avoid the direct provision of the law I have cited.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Suppose these voters who are known to be voters to the judges come and present affidavits and the judges hold them to be sufficient; now is there any good reason why, if one be held sufficient, the other should not follow suit? And if the judges hold them to be insufficient, then the parties would correct them; that is, if any good reason was given for their insufficiency which could be corrected.

Mr. SOWDEN. If it is held that they are insufficient?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes. The judges, in other words, are charged with the duty of determining the question of their sufficiency. I understand that they are charged with the duty primarily of determining whether the affidavits are sufficient or not. Now, if they hold the affidavits to be sufficient, there is no reason, as far as I can see, why they should be changed or additional reasons given, and it occurs to me that the matter is rather serious when you undertake to review their action.

Mr. PAYNE. My friend from Ohio has come to the same conclusion and reached the same difficulty which was found by my friend from Pennsylvania in the law once in force in that State upon this subject. They formerly had a registry law in that State that required certain things should be substantiated, and the question was whether the oath meant an affidavit or not, and that the registry officers should be satisfied by the oath of the party. Well, they found that the judges of election who had personal knowledge, or believed a man to be an elector, allowed him to vote; and so they found it necessary to amend the statute in Pennsylvania for the express purpose of requiring the voter to furnish an affidavit containing these facts—a statute almost precisely like that now in force in Iowa, and on which this case hinges. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in one hundred and fifth Pennsylvania Reports, decided under that law that there must be an affidavit setting forth these facts presented to the judges of election, and that an affidavit setting forth one fact and not the other, and not accompanied by the affidavit of a freeholder, for instance, was not sufficient; that there must be an affidavit not only of the elector but by a freeholder, conforming to the statute, before the vote could be received; and that if it is received, afterward on a contest it must be thrown out. That is the decision of the court in the Pennsylvania case.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I understand the statute of Iowa provides that one who is not registered shall not vote on election day unless he files an affidavit giving the reason why he was not so registered.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now, these affidavits of the one hundred and three or one hundred and four men, as the case may be, I understand were not filed, or rather they failed to give any reason or excuse for not having their names placed upon the register. So that the affidavit furnished was equivalent to being in blank when the point for giving the reason was reached?

Mr. PAYNE. That is my position.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. After they had gone thus far, suppose they had said in that blank "I decline to give a reason," or "I have no reason to give," so that the board passing upon it had no reason to consider. Now I understand the gentleman to claim that they had not the right to receive the vote of one who declined to give a reason, as the statute expressly required should be given. Is that the position of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PAYNE. I claim that the judges of election had no jurisdiction to pass upon that question, because it was a jurisdictional fact, made so by the statute; and the statute being mandatory, and that important fact being left out of the affidavit, it gave the judges of election no jurisdiction over the matter.

Talk about their conclusion being final! Being the judges, they must have something first to act upon. There must be a reason in the affidavit, else they act without jurisdiction. They get no jurisdiction by assuming it, and it does not make the ballot legal because they exceed their jurisdiction and take a ballot without the proof which the statute says there must be in the case before they can receive the ballot.

And, Mr. Speaker, I am not without authority in this House for holding that these statutes are mandatory. This question came up in the case of Curtin vs. Yocum, on the Pennsylvania statute, a statute which is very similar in its terms to this one. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]—I do not see him in his seat now—was then the chairman of the Committee on Elections. He made a report, concurred in by every Democratic member of the committee—and there were nine of them—in which he held that that act was mandatory and not directory. There were six Republican members of the committee. Three of them united in a minority report, in which they held that this statute was mandatory and must be carried out in its terms, but they held that there was no proof that these voters either voted for the Democratic candidate or that the affidavit required by the statute had not been filed according to law. They held there was want of proof, but still they held the statute was mandatory. I stated three other Republican members signed a minority report. I am mistaken in that; there was another minority report, signed by two Republicans and by one other member.

The constitution of Pennsylvania provides that no elector shall be deprived of his vote because his name is not on a registration list. That is a constitutional provision in Pennsylvania. Three other members of the committee, and one of them was the distinguished contestee in this case, Mr. Weaver, held that that statute was either unconstitutional or directory; that it could not be held mandatory, because it was in plain violation of this clause, a clause that holds that no elector can be deprived of his vote because his name is not on the registration list.

Mr. BRUMM. Have you that statute handy? I should like to show the difference between the two statutes on the point you are discussing.

Mr. PAYNE. I know the language of the statute.

Mr. BRUMM. You evidently do not, or you would not say the two statutes are the same, especially as to this latter part, because the Pennsylvania statute goes to the qualification of the voter.

Mr. PAYNE. Perhaps you will get time to explain that. I can not yield now.

Mr. BRUMM. I want you to take the time and clear yourself if you can.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is very kind. The majority report and the two minority reports came up for discussion in this House. Some distinguished gentlemen expressed their views on the question of this mandatory or directory statute. One of them was the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. I have listened to that gentleman frequently, but I do not think I ever heard him talk more to the point than he did on the occasion to which I refer. In his seven-minutes' speech on that question he says:

It has been stated here by my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. Calkins], I believe, that as to the voter the law of Pennsylvania is directory. Now, this is the first time that I have ever heard the principle announced that any law is directory upon the individual citizen. Wherever a law has been held directory by the courts, it has been where a duty was imposed upon a ministerial officer. Where such an officer was required by statute to do a particular thing in a particular way, and did it in some other way, but nevertheless did it, the courts have held in some instances that the act was legal, although done in a different manner from that pointed out by the statute. For instance, in a case arising at one time in California the statute required the return from the precinct to be sent to the county clerk by mail. It appeared in evidence that in this case the return was sent by express. The Committee on Elections properly held that the sending of this return by express, when the statutes said it should be sent by mail, did not invalidate the vote at that poll or justify throwing it out. That was a directory statute imposing a duty upon a ministerial officer. But no court, so far as I know, has held that a citizen may violate the law at pleasure, unless he is willing to take the responsibility of the penalty imposed for disobedience.

The law imposes certain duties upon the citizen, which duties have been clearly defined in the statute of Pennsylvania. That statute, not only mandatory but prohibitory in its terms, says that no man shall be permitted to vote whose name is not on the registry-list, unless he shall furnish to the election officers not only his own affidavit as to his qualifications to vote, but the affidavit of another elector at the poll that he has resided in the precinct sixty days next preceding the election. Here is a duty imposed upon the citizen, and he must take due notice of his responsibilities and duties under the law.

Responsibilities and duties under the law to furnish an affidavit showing a sufficient reason or some reason why he did not appear to have his name registered.

The law says to the citizen: "You may have your name registered within certain days; failing in that, the law presumes you to be an illegal voter, and throws upon you the burden of establishing your right to vote." It goes further, and says: "As there have been so many frauds committed, you must furnish proof in addition to that which you would have been required to furnish the registration officers; the evidence of your right to vote shall no longer rest in parol, but you shall furnish a written or printed affidavit signed by yourself and also the affidavit of an elector showing that you have resided sixty days in the election district and are entitled to vote." In the absence of this affidavit the election officers have no right to receive a vote; and without such affidavit a man, if unregistered, is not entitled to demand the right to vote. Not being registered and such affidavit not being furnished, his vote, if cast, is illegally cast, because cast in the very face of a prohibitory statute.

I find, Mr. Speaker, on examination that this view of the gentleman from Illinois was sustained by leading gentlemen upon the other side of this House. I have been looking over the list to see who voted to sustain that proposition so succinctly stated by Mr. SPRINGER, and I will read the names as they appear here in the RECORD. I find it is not the high privates merely that appear in the list, but it contains the major-generals, the very head-lights of the Democratic party on this floor—candidates for the Speakership, candidates for the Presidency. I find these names: Mr. BLAND, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. BRAGG, Mr. CABELL, Mr. CARLISLE, Mr. COBB, Mr. DAVIDSON, Mr. FORNEY, Mr. GEDDES, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HERBERT, Mr. KING, Mr. MCMILLIN, Mr. MORRISON, Mr. REAGAN, Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. R. W. TOWNSHEND, Mr. WELLBORN, and on the second vote Mr. LE FEVRE.

These gentlemen are in the House now, and I suppose, of course, they will vote the same way to-day, and vote that this law in Iowa, similar to the law in Pennsylvania, is mandatory in its character and must be complied with before a vote put into the ballot-box is a legal vote.

It will be observed that these gentlemen are not men "lingering superfluous on the stage," but they are the survival of the fittest, that is of what fittest there is on the other side of this Chamber; of course they will vote now consistently with what they voted in the Forty-sixth Congress. And, although the tables are turned, of course those gentlemen will now stand up and maintain that this law of Iowa, similar in its terms to the law of Pennsylvania, is as mandatory to-day upon their consciences and their votes as it was in the Forty-sixth Congress. So, Mr. Speaker, if we are to uphold the registry laws, if we are to maintain those safeguards, which seem to have been for wise purposes thrown around the ballot, if we are to maintain the integrity of the bollot, if we are to decide by our votes in a judicial manner the interpretation of this law, I trust that we shall not depart from the interpretation of the statute which says that a vote shall not be received unless the law has been complied with, because that has been the interpretation handed down from the Book of Moses, and never questioned except in an Illinois court, and perhaps in a contested-election case here. I trust, sir, that we shall obey this statute willingly and cheerfully, though at first it may grate upon our convictions of equity to throw out 103 votes which have been cast, but of the legality of which there is no proof saving the presumption that arises in favor of a vote that has been placed in the ballot-box. I hope that we shall uphold the dignity of the law, fearing not to declare the law as it is, and let the consequences take care of themselves.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN].

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, since was assigned to me the duty of rendering such assistance as I may be able to do in the presentation of the views of the minority in the case now at the bar of the House I have not had time to make more than a cursory examination of the record involved. What I shall say will be mainly based upon facts admitted in the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections, which facts are conclusive of this contest, the decision of which turns solely upon the construction to be given to the registry laws of Iowa as applied to such admitted or uncontroverted facts.

However, before entering upon that discussion I desire to say that there is no evidence in the case to justify the charge made that there was any colonization of voters in the sixth district of Iowa at the general election in November, 1884, at least not of any who voted for the contestant. And equally without foundation in the evidence is the charge that there were 35 illegal votes cast for the contestant, and which ought to be deducted from the aggregate of his votes as returned. And I can not believe that all the eminent gentlemen of the legal profession, members of the majority of the committee, can have examined the report. Had they done so they certainly could not, in my judgment, have concurred therein.

These questions, however, may be left out of our calculation so far as their materiality is concerned, or so far as they can aid us in arriving at a correct conclusion in this contest. And so indeed may all other questions before us except the one arising under the registration laws of Iowa, to which I now invite attention briefly. The question arising under those laws determines this case either in favor of the contestant or of the contestee, depending upon what construction shall be given to such registry laws. If they shall be held to be simply directory, then by a very liberal stretch of discretion gentlemen might possibly excuse themselves, to their own consciences, for the sake of their party, in voting to retain the contestee in his seat.

But I shall endeavor to show that even if the Iowa registry law shall be held directory merely, yet there has been such an entire failure of compliance therewith in the case now at the bar of the House that contestee should be unseated. If, on the other hand, it shall be held that the provisions of the Iowa registry law are mandatory, then all will admit that contestant was legally elected to the seat now held by contestee.

It would be a waste of time, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the proposition of the utility and value of a good, well-guarded, and well-enforced registry law. No intelligent man who, of late years, has watched the progress of events in this country but knows that there is no greater protection to the ballot-box and no more powerful promoter of the purity of the ballot than such a law. It is the duty of all upon whom is cast the responsibility of administering these as well as all other laws to see that they are so administered as to carry out the purpose and intent of the Legislature in their enactment, and that is, in case of registry laws, to preserve the purity of the ballot-box, to insure that none but legal votes shall be cast at our elections.

It is conceded that a sufficient number of votes were cast in the two voting precincts of East and West Oskaloosa, Mahaska County, Iowa, under the provisions of said registry laws, to sustain the returned majority for the sitting member if properly cast, or to overcome it and elect the contestant if they were illegal; it being conceded, or, if not conceded, established by the proof in the case, that they were cast for the contestee. It is to that disputed question of law I shall address myself during the remainder of the time allotted to me by the committee.

The following are the statutes of Iowa bearing upon this question, and are found in the Code of 1873, Laws of Iowa:

SEC. 595. The township trustees and clerk shall constitute the board of registry, and shall meet annually on the first Monday in September, at 9 o'clock a. m., and make a list of all qualified electors in their township, which shall be known as the register of elections.

SEC. 596. The register of elections shall contain the names at full length, alphabetically arranged, with the residence set opposite. It shall be made from the assessor's list and the poll-books of the previous election, and shall be kept by the township clerk, and shall, at all times, be open for inspection at his office without charge. He shall also, within two days after the adjournment of the board, post up a certified copy thereof in a conspicuous place in his office, or such other place as the board may direct.

SEC. 597. The board of registry shall hold a meeting at the place where the last general election was held, or if from any cause it can not be held at such place, then at some place to be designated by notice published in at least one paper printed in the township or posted in at least three public places therein, on the Tuesday preceding the general election of such year, at which they shall revise, correct, and complete the register of elections and shall hear any evidence that shall be brought before them in reference to such correction. * * * The names of all persons not qualified as electors shall be stricken from the register, and any person appearing to register his name may be challenged by any elector or member of the board, &c. * * * But no name shall be added to the register within five days next before the election.

The foregoing provisions do not apply to townships, incorporated towns, or cities having a population of less than 6,000 inhabitants, as shown by the last preceding census. Oskaloosa Township, including the east and west precincts, did have a population exceeding 6,000, and did come within those provisions.

Section 618, Code of Iowa of 1873 is in reference to general elections, and is as follows:

The judges in the elections precincts where the registry law is in force shall designate one of their number to check on the registry the name of every person voting, and no vote shall be received from any person whose name does not appear there, unless he shall furnish the judges his affidavit, showing that he is a qualified elector, and a sufficient reason for not appearing before the board on the day for correcting the register, and also shall prove by affidavit of one freeholder or householder, whose name is on the register, that such affiant knows him to be a resident of that election precinct, giving his residence by street and number if in a city or incorporated town, as the same is required to appear on the register. Said affidavit shall be kept by the judges, and all such affidavits may be administered by oath of the judges or clerks of the election.

The constitutional provision of the State of Iowa on this subject is as follows:

ART. 2, SEC. 1. Every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one who shall have been a resident of this State six months next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote sixty days, shall be entitled to vote at all elections which are now or hereafter may be authorized by law.

It does not contain the provision found in the constitution of some of the States from which cases have been cited, to the effect that no otherwise legally qualified voter should be deprived of his right to vote by any registry law, and on the effect of which constitutional provision the decisions in those cases were based. Section 605, Code of 1873, Laws of Iowa, also has a bearing on this question. It reads:

No person shall vote in any other precinct than that in which he resides at the time.

The question arising in this case under these statutes, as we shall more clearly see as we go on, is, are their requirements mandatory or directory; are they conditions precedent to voting, or may they be complied with or disregarded at the option or caprice of the voter or judges of election? I answer, that in my judgment, based upon reason, upon judicial construction, upon precedent, they are mandatory, they are conditions precedent, and must be complied with before an elector is entitled to cast his ballot.

It is argued in the report of the majority (the writer of which is an able lawyer, for whose legal judgment I have great respect, but which in this case I can not help feeling has been warped by what he would like to have it in this particular matter, and with which I can not agree) that the elector has no duty to perform and no responsibility to bear in regard to his registration; that it is wholly the duty of the board of registry to see that the register is properly made, revised, corrected, and completed; this can not, in all reason, be a proper construction of the law. It can not be that the Legislature of the State of Iowa, under the pretense of enacting a statute for the protection of the purity of the ballot-box, for the purpose of securing a fair vote and an honest count, gave to the people of that State a law providing a registry which on its very face must be incorrect and incomplete.

If the individual elector has no duty to perform in regard to this registration, then the very inception of the register is a fraud and a cheat, and shows upon the part of the Legislature a deliberate purpose to make an unfair, an incorrect, and an incomplete registry. This statute provides that in the first instance the list shall be made up from the poll-books of the last election held one year prior and from the assessment-books made nearly one year prior. Now, every one knows that even in the older States, where population is not constantly shifting and changing as it is in Iowa and the other new Western States, such a list could not possibly be a correct list of the electors for any particular year.

Since the last election many may have, and in nine precincts out of ten probably actually have, moved away and are wrongfully on the list. Many did not vote the year before, and consequently do not appear on the poll-book of the previous year, and the case now at bar is a good illustration of this. This election was held in the year 1884, the year of the Presidential election. It is the experience of us all that the vote on Presidential year is at least one-fifth heavier than any other, and no one would expect that nearly the entire number of voters in any particular precinct for 1884, Presidential year, would be found on the poll-books of the election of 1883. Neither would the deficiency be made up from the assessor's books, because all electors in Iowa do not pay taxes. Nor would the list of those liable to poll-tax show all, because at the age of forty-five in that State an elector is no longer liable to pay poll-tax or to perform military duty, so that when the board of registry has made up the register from the assessor's list and the poll-book of the previous year and adjourned it is absolutely certain that the register they have made is not correct; that it does not show a true list of qualified electors of the township for the current year.

The Legislature of Iowa never intended any such absurdity. Now, if the elector himself has nothing to do in the matter, why the subsequent provisions of the statute? Why the requirement that the "register of elections" "shall be kept by the township clerk, and shall at all times be open for inspection at his office?" Inspection by whom, unless it be by electors to see that they are properly registered? Why is the clerk required to post up a copy in his office within two days? Manifestly to give notice to electors as to who has been registered. How are they to get this notice if they are not expected to go to the office and look after their own registration? Why should the board of registration be required to hold a meeting to "revise, correct, and complete" the register on the Tuesday prior to the election, and to give notice of such meeting by publication?

Why notice if the individual elector has nothing to do, and if the duty and responsibility of the making, revising, correcting, and completing the register of elections is devolved wholly on the board of registry? Why does the law require that the board of registry "shall hear evidence that may be brought before them," if no one but themselves has anything to do with this making, revising, correcting, and completing the register? If the individual elector has nothing to do with the registering of his name, why does this statute provide that "any person appearing to register his name may be challenged?" This body is composed largely of lawyers. It is to this House, sitting as a jury and a court, judges of both the facts and the law, that this contestant submits his case. This court, like all others, is bound to adhere to the principles of law as established by well-grounded principles and precedents. And I appeal to you, my brethren of the bar, to act like judges in this matter.

We have no disputed facts to determine. We have a clear-cut question of law here, and nothing else; and let us come to its determination like lawyers, proud of their noble profession and bound to uphold its honor and its integrity. The members of this House who are at all versed in the legal profession will agree with me that as a general principle, when the highest judicial tribunal of a State has spoken upon the constitutionality of a statute of the State and has given a construction to its provisions, that declaration and that construction are conclusive on everybody and everywhere. The courts of the United States universally so hold, and when the State courts have spoken on such a question the Federal courts follow such State court on such questions implicitly, unless there shall be some question of derogation to the Federal Constitution, and there is no such question here. Will this House adopt any different rule? If, then, it shall appear to this House that the supreme court of Iowa has held this registry law constitutional and that its provisions are mandatory and not directory, I am sure the members of this body will rise above party prejudice, as they have heretofore done, to their credit be it said, and seat the contestant, the legally elected Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress of the sixth district of Iowa.

The supreme court of Iowa has so said (in Edwards vs. Banbury, 28 Iowa, 267). In that case a person whose name was not on the register presented himself to the judges, who knew he was a legal voter, except his name was not on the register, and he made the affidavit required by law, except he refused to give a sufficient reason. His vote was rejected. He sued the judges of election and was beaten. He appealed to the supreme court, and that court sustained the courts below. I extract from that case as follows:

The plaintiff is a white male citizen of the United States by birth, over thirty years of age, and is, and has been for several years last past a resident of said State of Iowa, and of said fourth ward, and a voter therein, all of which was well known to said defendants on said election day when they refused his vote. That on said election day, while the polls were still open and the judges waiting to receive votes (about 2 o'clock p. m.), plaintiff presented himself at said polls and offered his ballot to said judges, and offered to vote at said election, which the defendants refused; thereupon the plaintiff offered to take the oath of qualification as such voter as specified in section 494 of the revision of 1860, and demanded the privilege of voting, which the defendants refused, unless the plaintiff would furnish to defendants his affidavit showing a proper reason for not appearing before the board of registry, as provided in section 8, in chapter 171, of the acts of the Twelfth General Assembly of the State of Iowa, which plaintiff failed to do, protesting that he was not obliged so to do, and that under the constitution and laws he was fully entitled to vote without such conditions, and that the latter part of said section 8, commencing with the words "no vote shall be received," was unconstitutional and null, and again demanded the privilege of voting, which was refused. The name of the plaintiff not being on the register as provided by said statute, he was not permitted to vote at said election, although, except for such omission of his name from the register, defendants knew plaintiff to be a qualified voter.

The foregoing is a statement of the facts. In the opinion the court says:

"Respecting the right of suffrage," the constitution of this State (Article II, section 1) contains this provision: "Every male white citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of this State for six months next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote sixty days, shall be entitled to vote at all elections which are now, or hereafter may be, authorized by law."

This section of the constitution defines who shall be an elector. Our system of government is based upon the popular will. This will declares itself at the ballot-box. The propriety of having the organic law determine who may vote is manifest and indisputable. This is done by the section of the constitution just quoted. It fixes the minimum age of voters and the minimum length of residence. The Legislature can not change these particulars, nor any others which are specified in the constitution.

* * * * * * *

Whoever possesses the qualifications there mentioned is an elector; and his right to vote being thus given and secured by the constitution, is a right of which it is not in the power of the Legislature to deprive or divest him.

It is admitted that these qualifications confer a right. The right thus conferred is the right to vote. This right is held by a constitutional and not by a legislative tenure. It can not be destroyed or impaired by the Legislature. So far all is clear.

It is equally clear to our minds that the Legislature may regulate the exercise of this right, leaving the right itself untouched. They may, for example, make reasonable provisions for determining the age, length of residence, &c., of persons who offer to vote.

Every citizen who is entitled to vote is interested in having excluded from the box the ballots of those not entitled. To prevent fraudulent voting, to insure the purity of the ballot-box, are objects which fall properly within the provision of legislative power and duty.

We thus see the boundaries of legislative power. Those whom the constitution declares shall be electors can not be disfranchised, and not one jot or tittle can lawfully be added to or taken from the qualifications which the constitution prescribes.

But the Legislature, while it must leave the constitutional qualifications intact, and can not add new ones, may, nevertheless, prescribe regulations to determine whether a given person, who proposes to vote, possesses the required qualifications, and these regulations are valid, provided they do not amount to a denial or invasion of the right conferred by the constitution. (State vs. Leon, 9 Wis., 279.) To insure the integrity of the ballot-box, the Legislature has determined that a registry law is expedient.

The Legislature is supposed best to know the situation and wants of the State, and whether there is a necessity for laws of a particular character; and when such laws do not invade the constitutional rights of the citizens this court can not sit in judgment upon the wisdom of the General Assembly, but must respect, obey, and carry out the legislative will.

The act in question professes to be one intended to prevent fraudulent voting; and the court sees no reason to believe that the professed purpose is not the true purpose. It aims to secure this end by requiring a registry of voters. It provides for notice, and fixes a time and place in which it may be made or revised. It gives every voter an opportunity to have his name placed on the register. There is a board of registry for each township, or each town or city. Thus the convenience of the citizen is consulted.

* * * * * * *

Registry law, or laws providing that a list of voters shall previously be made, are not unusual (Auld vs. Walton, 12 La. An. 129; Harris vs. Whitcomb, 4 Gray, 433; Huggit vs. Lewis, 28 Eng. L. and Eq., 326), and the main object of them is to prevent fraudulent voting. Whether such laws are wisely adapted to effect this end, and do more good than harm, is, as above remarked, a matter solely for legislative wisdom to decide.

* * * * * * *

Guided by the principles before set forth, it is the opinion of this court that the portion of the registry law upon which the plaintiff relies is not in conflict with the constitution.

The foregoing case settles the constitutionality of the registry law of Iowa. (See also Patterson vs. Barlow, 60 Pa. St., 54—a strong case.) The supreme court of Iowa has also decided in explicit terms that the provisions of the law are mandatory in Nefzger vs. D. and Saint Paul Railroad, 36 Iowa, 644. In this case a certain township had voted a tax for railway purposes without the voters being registered. The tax was declared carried, and the same was actually assessed. One tax-payer (the plaintiff) resisted the collection upon the ground that the registry law had not been complied with. The case went to the supreme court and that court sustained the tax-payer, set the tax aside, and enjoined its collection as void because of non-compliance with the statute. The court says:

We deem it unnecessary to consider only the second ground of relief, namely, the entire disregard of the provisions of the registry law, for it seems to us, upon that ground if none other, the action of the court is fully sustained. Section 8, chapter 171, Twelfth General Assembly provides:

* * * * * * *

(The act already quoted.)

The object of the act, as declared in its title, is to prevent fraudulent voting. Its language is mandatory. It reads: "No vote shall be received from any person whose name does not appear upon the register." To hold that an elector may vote whose name is not on the register would render an observance of the law merely optional and its provisions merely nugatory.

The court refers to and quotes 16 Michigan, 342; 21 Wisconsin, 566; Dwarris on Statutes, 715, and cases cited.

The supreme court of the State of Iowa has thus settled this case, and contestant ought not to be expected to go further. But Iowa is not alone in holding such statutes mandatory.

In Brightly's Leading Cases on Elections, page 453, edition of 1871, it is said:

If election officers receive a vote without preliminary proof which the law makes an essential prerequisite to its reception, such vote is as much an illegal vote as if the voter had none of the qualifications required by law. The voter might not be able, on the day of election, to produce the legal preliminary proof, and it would not appear to be just to the candidates to permit a vote to be made legal by evidence subsequently procured which was absolutely illegal when received by the officers. (State vs. Helmantel, 21 Wis., 566; State vs. Stump, 23 id., 630.)

This we deem the only just view to be taken of the election law, and the only one which will remedy the evil of constantly recurring contested elections. (See People vs. Kopplekam, 16 Mich., 324.) The rule here indicated was enforced in Gibbons vs. Sheppard, 2 Brewster, 129, when the court refused credit for every vote prima facie illegal in which the testimony did not show that at the time of voting the offer was supported by the proof which the law demands.

Every voter not on the register is prima facie illegal.

In re Election of McDonough, 105 Pennsylvania, 490:

The above case was decided on the Pennsylvania statute, similar to the Iowa statute (it was only decided in 1882), thus putting at rest all doubt, if any, theretofore existing. Judge Trunkey, delivering the opinion of the court, on page 491, says:

"In the absence of registry of the name of the voter and affidavits, rejection of the vote by the officers is an imperative duty. Upon conviction of neglect of that duty, they shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be punished by fine and imprisonment. By the natural meaning of the language of the statute, no unregistered person can lawfully vote until he produces the affidavits. All parties agree that the votes of persons whose names are not registered, and who produce no affidavits, are, prima facie, illegal. Shall such votes be counted as legal on the trial of a contested election upon proof that they were cast by persons who possessed the qualifications of an elector? This is the only question raised." * * *

After arguing the question and citing authorities, the court say, on page 495:

"We are of opinion that it is the imperative duty of an elector, whose name is not on the list of registered voters, to produce the required affidavits at the time he offers his vote, and that the election officers have no power to waive the production of the essential proofs. And the vote of such person offered and received, without the requisite affidavits, is illegal and can not be made legal at a subsequent investigation in the courts."

The case of Doerflinger vs. Helmantel, twenty-first Wisconsin, page 566, is precisely in point, the Wisconsin statute being almost verbatim with the Iowa statute. The court say:

"It is essentially an imperative statute, and deprives the inspectors of all jurisdiction to receive the votes of unregistered voters, unless the conditions as to the affidavit and oath are fully complied with. And first it is to be observed that there is a material difference between this and former statutes. They were regulations of the time and manner of conducting elections, designed for the government of the officers having charge of the polls. No duty was imposed upon the voters except that of going to the polls and depositing their votes. It was considered that the voters ought not to forfeit their privileges or lose their votes by reason of the mistakes or misconduct of the officers, which it was out of the power of the voters to remedy or prevent.

"By this act, however, every voter is made or may become an agent in the execution of the law. Copies of the register, as made by the board, are filed in the office of the town, village, or city clerk, and posted in some conspicuous place in the room in which the meeting is held, so as to be accessible to any elector who may desire to examine the same or make copies thereof. On Tuesday preceding the general election a meeting of the board of registry is held at the place designated for holding the polls of election for the purpose of revising, correcting, and completing the lists. Any elector of the district whose name has been omitted may appear at such meeting and cause the same to be entered upon the register. If he does not so appear, and still desires to vote, he must furnish the inspectors at the polls his affidavit, giving his reasons for not appearing on the day for the correction of the register, and likewise prove, by the oath of a householder of the district, that he knows him to be an inhabitant of the district; and, if in an incorporated village or city, give his residence within the district. In this matter of a voter whose name has been omitted, and who has not appeared on the day for the correction of the register, the burden of answering the requirements of the law, by furnishing the affidavit and proof, is thrown upon the voter himself. He is presumed to know the law, and must go to the polls prepared to comply with its conditions; and if he does not, and his vote is lost, it may, so far as it is the fault of any one, with justice be said to be his own fault. It is in the nature of a penalty imposed by the law for his neglect to do what is required of him. The inspectors can not receive his vote, and, if they can not, it can not afterwards be received and counted by the courts.

"And next it is to be observed that it is a negative statute. It has been said on very high authority that negative words will make a statute imperative. (Dwarris on Statutes, 715, 7 Law Lib., 55 and cases cited.) The words of the act are: 'No vote shall be received at any annual election in this State, unless,' &c. It is difficult to conceive of any language more strongly imperative than this." (21 Wisconsin, pages 568-571.)

This case completely disposes of the long and ingenious argument of the majority report to the effect that the judges of election having received the votes no question can afterwards be raised as to their legality, or that the burden of showing their illegality is thrown upon the attacking party. We assert with the utmost confidence that in every case cited by the majority report or in argument, wherein it is held that a vote once received must be proved to be illegal before it can be stricken off, the court or committee held the law under which they acted to be directory and not mandatory. We concur in that, where a regulation is only directory, and a vote is received without compliance with the directions, it must be proven to be illegal before it can be stricken off. The converse of the proposition is equally as well established—that where the directions are mandatory, and are disregarded, the vote must be stricken off.

This House decided in Le Moyne vs. Farwell, Contested-Election Cases (Forty-fourth Congress), 1871 to 1876, in substance as we claim. The committee in that case said in reference to the fourth precinct, eighteenth ward of the city of Chicago:

In this precinct contestant objects to seven affidavits furnished by voters for contestee, upon the ground that they do not appear to have been sworn to before any officer. There is no jurat thereto. It is agreed (therefore unanimous) that the same are fatally defective, and the votes therefore should be deducted from the contestee.

We also, fortunately, have another precedent. In the Forty-sixth Congress was pending the contested-election case of Curtin vs. Yocum, in which a report was made which ought to have great weight with our friends upon the other side of this Chamber. In that case the majority report of the Committee on Elections was sustained by every Democratic member of the House, I believe. It was made by the chairman of the committee, and the majority report of the same committee in this House and in this case says of that report:

A most elaborate and learned report was made by the majority, Mr. SPRINGER being the chairman, holding that the statute was mandatory, and such votes should be excluded.

I commend that learned report to the careful and prayerful perusal of my Democratic friends; though possibly in these days of "reform" you have also reformed your ideas of constitutional law and of the purity of elections, which last God grant may be true. It would seem utterly useless to further pile up authorities. The highest court of Iowa decided, as shown, that a voter not registered, though known to the election officers to be otherwise qualified, could not vote unless he gave "a sufficient" reason; further, that the registry law is mandatory. These decisions, backed by the others cited, seem sufficient to establish the issue in favor of contestant, that the law of affidavits is mandatory and must be strictly complied with, and that a person voting without such compliance must be stricken from the poll.

With this array of authorities I can not see how this House can be turned away from its duty because Illinois under the provisions of its constitution and laws may have held the registry law of that State directory; and it is upon the Illinois case that the claim of the majority is planted. This brings us to the question as to what the defects in the affidavits were in the case at bar. Prima facie, at least, all these voters who were not upon the register had no right to vote, and their right to do so could only be restored by a compliance on their part with the requirements of the registry law. By that law each one is required to present to the election board his own affidavits, showing—

1. That he is a qualified elector; that is—

(a) That he has been a resident of the State six months;

(b) That he has been a resident of the county sixty days;

(c) That he resides at the time of voting in the election precinct in which he offers to vote; and

(d) That he is a citizen of the United States.

2. A sufficient reason for not appearing before the board on the day of revising, correcting, and completing the register.

Did the men who voted in the east and west Oskaloosa precincts for the sitting member, and who were not upon the register, comply with these mandatory provisions of the register law of the State of Iowa? We answer emphatically, no.

I gather from this record the following figures:

Not registered, and who gave in their affidavits no reason for their failure	31
Not registered, vouched for by Charles or C. Blatner, himself not a registered voter, as required by law	38
Not registered, and who give as a reason "neglect"	13
Not registered, and who give as a reason "left off the register"	103
Total	185

The first class did not attempt to give any reason for their not appearing at the time appointed for the revising, correcting, and completing the register. The statute is imperative in that regard, and the case of Banbury vs. Edwards, already cited, is conclusive upon that point, and these 31 votes must be excluded from the count.

The second class were vouched for by Charles or C. Blatner, who was not a registered voter, at least it does not so appear from the evidence, and the burden was upon the contestee to show that these unregistered men became legal voters. Hence these 38 votes must be stricken from the poll of the sitting member.

But we may discard these 38 votes from our calculations, and still the final result is the same.

The third class say that they did not appear because of "neglect." This is the first time I have ever heard eminent lawyers contend that a party's own neglect was a sufficient reason for his shortcomings. This reduces contestee's vote 13 more.

The reason of the fourth class is still more indefensible; they say they did not appear because they were "left off the register." Now, mark, that they shall give "a sufficient reason for not appearing before the board on the day for correcting the register." (The Tuesday before the election is the requirement of the statute.) Not a sufficient reason why they do not appear on the register on election day, but a sufficient reason why they did not appear the week before; and they say the reason was that they were "left off the register," the only reason under the sun why they should have appeared. If they had not been "left off the register," if they had been on the register, then would there have been no occasion for appearing. And yet they say they did not appear for the only reason which made it necessary for them to appear, and we are gravely told that that is a "sufficient reason" under a mandatory statute. Ought they not to have been required to give some sort of a reasonable excuse—that they did not know they were "left off," that they were sick, that they were out of the county, or some excuse or reason likely to have some influence on the human mind? It seems to me so, and that this law in the interest of pure elections should be strictly upheld.

If they had presented affidavits alleging as a reason for not appearing on the day for correcting the register any reason which could possibly be an excuse for not so appearing, and the judges of election had held the same "sufficient," I am not prepared to say that it could be taken advantage of here. In this case it is not necessary to go so far as that. But I can not subscribe to the doctrine that it is a "sufficient reason" for not appearing to give no reason or excuse whatever, or to allege the voter's own "neglect," or to assign as a "sufficient reason" for not appearing that they were "left off," the only thing which under the law made it necessary for the voter to appear at all.

If perchance any honest voter lost his vote by his own neglect he must bear the consequence; better that than a reckless disregard of the laws made for the protection of the ballot should be encouraged and sustained. In that event the salutary laws for the protection of the franchise would become a mockery and our own republican institutions become endangered. Better that these few voters in Iowa, though legally qualified electors in all respects except the registry, should be deprived of their votes at one past election than that this House should set a precedent which would legalize universal and unrestrained fraud and authorize the casting of thousands of illegal votes in all our large cities at all future elections.

Deduct from contestee's vote the illegal votes claimed to have been established by contestant, and contestant is elected. Deduct the votes of those voting on no affidavits or on defective affidavits and he is elected by a much larger majority than that by which the sitting member now claims the seat.

Let the majesty of the law be upheld, and when the roll of this House is called after to-day Frank T. Campbell will answer instead of James B. Weaver.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to have been assumed in the early part of this discussion that the position taken by the minority of the Committee on Elections was gratuitous, and it has been hinted that it was partisan. For one, sir, I signed the minority report with great reluctance. I should have preferred to have signed that of the majority if I could have found any warrant in law to justify me in so doing. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in the decision of these questions we sit as a high court of judicature, and are bound under our oaths to obey the laws of our country. In the few minutes that I shall address the House I shall address them upon a question of law. The question is, is the statute of Iowa which has been quoted here mandatory or directory? In the first place, in a well-considered, carefully drawn, and exceedingly able opinion prepared by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], and signed by every Democratic member of the committee—an opinion which is conclusive upon this question, as it seems to me—I find it held that a statute exactly similar to the one involved in this case is mandatory. I find, too, that the supreme court of the State of Iowa, whose decisions in the case now under consideration are binding upon this House, have heretofore ruled that this statute is constitutional, that an election in disobedience to its provisions is void; and in that decision of the supreme court of Iowa I find cited with approval a decision reported in 21 Wisconsin. If that decision which has been cited by the supreme court of Iowa with approval is good law, then I stand upon firm ground.

Allow me to read a brief extract from the opinion in that case which "goes upon all fours" in all its facts with the case now under consideration. The court says:

> It is furthermore alleged that of those 544 votes which were received by the judges of the election, 145 were received from persons no one of whom proved to the inspectors receiving his vote, by the oath of a householder of the district, that he knew such person to be an inhabitant of the district, nor did any one of them furnish the inspectors any proof upon oath that he was a resident of the election district. It will be seen from these statements, not that there was a total want of proof or any attempt to evade the requirements of the act, but only that the proof was in some particulars defective. It is not, therefore, a question whether the statute may be wholly disregarded or dispensed with by the inspectors, but whether, when an attempt is made in good faith to execute it, a mistake in the execution, or any departure however slight from the terms of the statute, will vitiate the proceedings and annul the votes so irregularly received.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ELY. I am unable to yield. I hope the gentleman will pardon me, but my time is too brief. Now, I say with Chief-Justice Dixon, writing this opinion for the supreme court of Wisconsin, that I feel reluctant to subscribe to a doctrine which would disfranchise a voter, otherwise qualified, because he lacks simply the qualification of registration. But such is the law. There is not a single word in any text-book referring to this question, there is not a decision of a single court of last resort, except that of Illinois (to which I hope to have time to refer), that does not sustain the minority of this committee in the position which they take. In addition to the Iowa decision we have the opinion of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, the unanimous opinion of the court, deciding the same thing. In that opinion the court say of these decisions in Illinois: "Such judicial construction nullifies the law to prevent fraudulent voting." Now, sir, these decisions in Illinois go to the extent of deciding that if a vote is received by the judges of election, although no affidavit is made, although the voter's name does not appear on the registry-list, yet the vote having been received by the judges, though without legal right and against the law, that vote shall be counted. For one, Mr. Speaker, in the light of these decisions, in the light of the able report of the committee of this House, to which I have referred, I am unable to bring my mind to any such conclusion, though I have tried earnestly to do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a single word in regard to these affidavits and the reasons which they give. The statute says that the reason shall be a sufficient reason. What is a sufficient reason, I would inquire? I maintain that no reason is sufficient which could apply to every case that could possibly arise. It may be that a reason would be common to a certain number of voters who had not registered; but a reason which must necessarily apply to every man, however negligent is, in my judgment, no sufficient reason.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] for three minutes.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, since the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELY] declined to be interrupted, I thank the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL] for his kindness in yielding a few minutes of his time to me in which to make the point I had intended to raise in my question to the gentleman from Massachusetts. He stated in his remarks that the case of Doerflinger vs. Helmantel, Wisconsin Reports, volume 21, page 566, was exactly on all fours with the case now under consideration. In this statement I wish to take issue with him and point out wherein he errs.

In the case before the House now, the necessary affidavit required to be furnished the judges of election by the unregistered voter, showing that he is a qualified elector under the statute of Iowa, was furnished by the men who offered to vote in Oskaloosa Township, and their affidavits were supplemented in each case by an affidavit of a freeholder or householder whose name was on the register, certifying to the fact of the elector's residence in the election precinct, &c., as required by law. This was not done in the case cited and relied upon by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as a careful examination of it will disclose. If this be true, and we are correct in what we have said, how can the gentleman successfully contend that his position is sustained by the case cited and that it is on all fours with the case now under consideration? In the very case upon which he relies the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court—Chief-Justice Dixon—says:

> It is furthermore alleged that of those 544 votes, 145 were received from persons no one of whom proved to the inspectors receiving his vote, by the oath of a householder of the district, that he knew such person to be an inhabitant of the district, nor did any one of them furnish the inspectors any proof upon oath that he was a resident of the election district.

It would seem from this that the case so confidently relied on by the gentleman from Massachusetts as being on all fours with that pending before the House differs most materially from it in this, that in the case under consideration it is admitted on all sides that the necessary affidavits required under the laws of Iowa were furnished the judges of election by the unregistered voters at the time they offered to vote, as also the affidavits of the freeholders certifying that these electors resided in the election precinct, &c., in which they offered to vote, as required under the statute. All this was wanting in the case cited. The only question upon which this case seems to hinge is, whether a sufficient reason was given by these unregistered electors for their neglect to register, or for not appearing before the board of registration on the day fixed by law for correcting the register.

The judges of election passed upon that question when they received the votes of these men. Had they believed the affidavits insufficient or the reasons given therein for non-registration unsatisfactory, they undoubtedly would have refused to accept the votes offered when the affidavits could have been amended to meet the requirements of the judges of the election, who alone were to pass upon the question of their sufficiency. In accepting the votes the judges admitted that the affidavits were sufficient, and I contend that neither the Committee on Elections nor this House are warranted in going behind the decision of the election officers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Speaker, while I do not agree with some of the statements of fact contained in the majority report, I do agree with the conclusion that the sitting member is entitled to retain his seat. I desire to occupy a moment in stating the grounds upon which I found that belief. The whole question turns upon certain votes cast upon affidavits. If the votes cast upon affidavits are thrown out where those affidavits are not in exact accordance with the law, then the sitting member loses his seat; if those votes are not thrown out, he retains it.

It will not do to say that this question is entirely settled, because there are judicious decisions on both sides. I believe, however, that the reason of the case is in favor of counting the votes. This House itself, by a majority vote, has decided in favor of the view presented by the majority of the committee. This case, however, illustrates how men may change sides upon a question of this sort, for it is true that in the Curtin-Yocum case every Democratic member of the committee reported in favor of the view presented by the minority here. It is true that the Republican side of the House took the view then that I now take, that this provision of law in regard to the filing of affidavits is directory, not mandatory.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ROWELL. I have only five minutes, and I believe I will not.

Mr. PAYNE. I wanted to call attention——

Mr. ROWELL. Five minutes is not very long in which to talk upon a legal question, and, without any disrespect to the gentleman, I can not surrender any portion of my time.

The courts of Pennsylvania have decided in favor of the mandatory character of a provision of this nature. The State of Wisconsin also has so decided. The State of Iowa in dicta has so decided; but the direct question involved in this case was not presented for decision, otherwise I should feel bound to follow the judgment of that case. The State of Illinois, on the other hand, where the questions involved in this case were passed upon, has decided that a provision of this kind is directory, and that decision is based upon this fact: When an affidavit is required to be presented to a board of election judges, that board is necessarily constituted a judicial tribunal to pass upon the affidavit; and when the vote has been duly received, the sufficiency of the affidavit has been passed upon and may not thereafter be questioned, unless the voter, for other reasons, was not entitled to deposit his ballot. For instance, under this law a registry is provided, but the fact there is a registry law does not prohibit a man from voting whose name has not been registered. But herein this election law differs from election laws where no man may vote unless his name is upon the registry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROWELL. I hope I will be allowed a few minutes longer.

Mr. HALL. I will yield two minutes longer.

Mr. ROWELL. The voter may not know his name is not upon the registry, and if the election judges receive his vote without informing him of that fact they deprive him of the opportunity to comply with the law, and their fault ought not to deprive the voter of his vote. In the same way, if they present an affidavit informal in character, not complying with the terms of the law, it is their duty to call his attention to the fact, but he ought not to be deprived of his right to have his vote counted because officers of the law have neglected their duty. And it is for that reason I am not willing to unseat a man who has been elected by legal voters because of any neglect on the part of election officers to do their duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALL. I will yield for one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I do not deem it necessary to say anything in this case except to call the attention of the House to one single fact, and I think that fact ought not only to convince the most skeptical, but to change the mind of any one who had formed a different opinion, and I state that fact with pride, that from personal knowledge in the last thirty years while the Republican party held power in Iowa this is the first time, wherever there was contention, the Republican State board issued a certificate to the Democratic contestant, as they have done in this case. I say that fact alone, that the Republican State board of Iowa issued this certificate to General Weaver, is conclusive to my mind that he was elected, and they were compelled to do that which their sympathy and judgment wished could have been otherwise.

Mr. HALL. If no other member on this side of the House wishes to be heard I will attempt to bring this case to a conclusion in as short a time as possible.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, it is proper for me to say this contest has excited no little interest in that portion of the State of Iowa from which it came. The Republican press at the time, and constantly since, have seen proper to charge upon the incumbent that he was a usurper, occupying a seat which belonged of right to the contestant, that he had obtained it by improper, corrupt means and the pernicious influences supposed to affect elections. I think it is an opportune time, here upon the floor of this House where this question is being considered, to state that upon the record presented there is no claim or pretense of fraud or wrong upon the part of the contestee, and in all the evidence there is no intimation of bribery, votes cast fraudulently, or of colonization of improper votes, and the only charges in that direction are those which throw a shadow around the methods resorted to on behalf of the contestant himself.

The record discloses that men were bribed to vote for the contestant, that negroes from adjoining counties were colonized in this district and cast illegal votes for him.

In addition is the fact I alluded to in my statement of the case that in two precincts of Oskaloosa County there was improper manipulation of the registry-list, by which there was an attempt at least to limit and impair the right to vote of some 200 electors. Their names were purposely left off the registry-list of that township. We find that manipulation having its origin and its inception with adherents of the contestant. Now, in order that we may adhere clearly and closely to the precise case that is before the House, I wish to correct a statement contained in a question suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] that there were 103 of these affidavits that contained no reason whatever for not being upon the registry-list. The fact is that there are but 31 of such affidavits, not enough, according to the concession of both the minority and majority reports, to change the result of the election. There are one hundred and three affidavits in which the cause or reason assigned for not being upon the registry-list is "neglect," or being omitted—"left off" of the registry-list.

Now, when the members of this House will understand that on the morning of the November election, when the electors met for the purpose of casting their ballots, there were old and reputable citizens, men who had lived there a lifetime, who had voted for twenty years there, who found themselves omitted from the registry-list where it was the high and imperative duty of the registration board to place and keep their names; when, I say, they found that nearly 25 per cent. of the entire voting population had been omitted from the list, it produced a most profound sensation in the community; and you can well understand that the words "neglect," as used in these affidavits, or "left off the lists," as used in others, do not mean neglect on the part of the elector himself, but the neglect or the willful omission on the part of the registration board. I think I may appeal to the judgment not only of Democrats but of Republicans to hold that "neglect" or "left off the list" was an ample and sufficient excuse why the elector's name was not upon the registry-list, and entitled him to vote upon presentation of his affidavit.

But this question, not only with reference to the affidavits which were left in blank but of all the affidavits, can be settled upon a well-recognized principle, and it is this, that by the constitution of the State of Iowa the right of franchise is conferred and does not depend upon any act of the Legislature.

Under the well-settled law in such cases the Legislature has no power to add any conditions to the legal qualifications of the elector, neither can it take any of them away. It can provide rules and regulations as to registration and provide a system for the conduct of elections, but it can make no conditions by such law or system of registration which will make it an essential prerequisite of the right of the elector to cast his vote, and hence it has been recognized by all the authorities on this subject—it is so declared by Cooley in his excellent work on constitutional limitations—that every registry system which operates to deny to any man the right to vote on the day and place of election can only do so upon the principle that the elector voluntarily and of his own motion abstains from exercising his right under that registry law. Only a conviction of felony can deprive him of the right which the constitution guarantees to him as an elector. It proceeds upon the idea that the man who abstains from voting loses no right and is deprived of no privilege. It is a voluntary action upon his part.

Under the registration system men who failed to apply within the time fixed by the law for having their names entered upon the register may be justly deemed to have voluntarily abstained from exercising the right of suffrage. But in the case before us there is no instance of that kind. There is no case where any citizen willfully or voluntarily abstained from the exercise of his right of franchise.

The cases cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in the course of his argument do not, therefore, pertain and are not applicable to the question with which we are now dealing. It reminds me somewhat of the remark of a philosopher that filth was nothing but matter in the wrong place, and while he cited some very good law, unquestionably it had no proper application to this case.

This is not a case where the judges allowed a man to vote who was not upon the registry-list, and knew he was not there. There is no such allegation set up in the case. It is not a case of a direct violation of the law, but it is a case where the elector, knowing that he was not upon the list in good faith and in pursuance of the law, made every effort to comply with it and do those things requisite to enable him to exercise an important right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question arises who shall determine for him whether his attempt to comply with the law is a compliance or not. The law prescribes the method of determining that, and it seems there can be little question of the fact. It is a matter with which the judges of election have to deal. When the judges have recognized him as an elector, when they have declared that his name is upon the list, or have accepted his vote upon his affidavit, and declared that to be sufficient, I say that makes the vote legal, and that there is no other tribunal which has authority to review or reconsider the action of that board in arriving at that conclusion. Why, consider for a moment the practical application of the case, and it will be seen at once what the effect would be. An elector to-day approaches the polls for the purpose of voting, supposing his name to be upon the registry-list; yet he can not know positively that it is there. He knows that it ought to be there, for it is the duty of the registry board to place it there. He presents his ballot and is met by a statement of the judges that he is registered. Why, Mr. Speaker, even though an elector had gone within the five days before the election to the registry board and had seen his name upon the list in their possession, it might subsequently have been erased either fraudulently or by accident; so that when he asks to exercise his right to vote, and asks if he is registered, there is no power that can answer that question but the judges themselves.

Suppose the judges inspect the registry and tell him he is registered, and accept his ballot; it may be they have made a mistake; it may be they are acting fraudulently. But so far as he is concerned they make the response imposed upon them by law, and accept his ballot. I care not whether they make a verbal response or make a response by accepting his ballot and giving him to understand he has a right to vote.

Now, can any gentleman find any legal learning that after that procedure has been gone through will authorize the rejection of that ballot upon subsequent discovery that the judges erred or that the elector was not in fact registered? Would it not operate as a direct and immediate fraud on the elector and deprive him of that locus penitentiæ which, upon the discovery that he is not on the registry-list, would have enabled him to apply through affidavit? Are not all his rights cut off by that construction, and would not the law contravene the provisions of the constitution which confer upon him his elective franchise?

The supreme court of Ohio used this language in referring to a decision by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Capen vs. Foster, 12 Pickering, 488.

It was held substantially that laws of the latter description (registry laws) must be reasonable, uniform, and impartial, and must be calculated to facilitate and to save rather than to subvert or impede the exercise of the right to vote.

I hold that any law that deprives an elector of his vote after his ballot has been received under the circumstances narrated contravenes the constitutional provision which gives him that right and is a trap and a snare.

There are laws which are in part mandatory and in other parts directory; and this registry law may certainly be said to belong to this class. The case from Iowa cited by the gentleman from New York, in which the supreme court of that State held that this law was mandatory, referred simply to this law in its general sense as requiring elections to be held under a registry system. The court did not consider for a moment whether a voter whose vote had just been received in good faith could be deprived of it, or as to what were the qualities and qualifications of an affidavit to enable the unregistered voter to cast his ballot.

The same thing is true of the case cited from Pennsylvania. It merely holds that the law is mandatory in so far as that men who knew that they are not registered, and have no right to vote, are allowed to exercise that right in violation of law; but where a man votes supposing he is on the registry, and is in the attitude of endeavoring to comply with the law, then that man's ballot goes into the urn and will stay there until the ultimate and final count is made.

The same thing applies to the affidavit. What is the purpose of the affidavit? Nothing in the world but a petition addressed to the judges of election, in which a citizen, omitted from the registry, asks to exercise the privilege possessed by those on the register. He has to furnish some statement, some excuse to be addressed to the judges. They are to hear and determine and decide whether the vote is to be received or rejected. It is a simple proposition, applicable to all tribunals, whether judicial or ministerial, that under those circumstances the action of the tribunal is final and conclusive so far as the non-essentials are concerned.

Hence it is, I will say without detaining the House longer, that the majority of the committee have come to the conclusion that in so far as concerns the statements and reasons and descriptions of persons and things which are required to be set forth in the affidavit the law is simply directory and permits that application, stated in the language of the elector himself, to be presented to the judges, and if incorrect or imperfect to be corrected until it is acceptable if the facts will justify it, and when accepted it makes the vote a valid one against every consideration except that the voter himself was not a lawfully qualified elector under the laws and constitution of the State.

I therefore move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAMMOND). The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not think it is understood what the resolutions are.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the pending resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Frank T. Campbell was not elected to a seat in the Forty-ninth Congress as a member from the sixth Congressional district of the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That James B. Weaver was elected and is entitled to retain his seat in the Forty-ninth Congress as a member from the sixth Congressional district of the State of Iowa.

Mr. CRISP. Is not the vote first on the substitute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No substitute has been offered.

Mr. CRISP. I was under the impression that a substitute was pending.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not hear the demand for the previous question. It was certainly my intention to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not responsible for that.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent now to offer a substitute, notwithstanding that the previous question has been ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I offer as a substitute for the resolutions of the majority of the committee the resolutions recommended by the minority.

The Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

Resolved, That James B. Weaver was not elected to a seat in the Forty-ninth Congress as a member from the sixth Congressional district of Iowa, and is not entitled to a seat.

Resolved, That Frank T. Campbell was elected and is entitled to a seat in the Forty-ninth Congress as a member from the sixth Congressional district of the State of Iowa.

The substitute was not agreed to.

The resolutions of the committee were agreed to.

Mr. HALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE—PAGE VS. PIRCE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to call up the resolution which is reported from the Committee on Elections in the Rhode Island contested-election case of Page vs. Pirce.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William A. Pirce, sitting member from the second Congressional district of Rhode Island, be allowed thirty days from the passage of this resolution within which to resubpœna and cross-examine witnesses heretofore examined by Charles H. Page, the contestant, and to take any testimony he may desire, and that ten days thereafter be allowed to said Page to take evidence in rebuttal.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in my own judgment there is very little occasion for discussion of this resolution, but I understand that our friends on the other side think otherwise. Therefore I wish to inquire whether if I should now move the previous question there would be an hour for discussion after that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the previous question were ordered without previous debate there would be fifteen minutes allowed for debate on each side.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is not adequate. I think there ought to be a fair opportunity to discuss this question. It is not a question of party politics. It is a question beyond and above that. As it seems to me, it is establishing a precedent, and I think we ought to have it thoroughly discussed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I do not see what is the necessity of any discussion at all about this matter.

Mr. REED, of Maine. There is very great necessity.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Why?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I should have to go through the discussion to show you why.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to one hour.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I shall object.

Mr. ROWELL. I object. If you will make it four hours, I shall make no objection.

Mr. ROBERTSON. How long do you gentlemen on that side want?

Mr. REED, of Maine. We want two hours.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, our friends upon the other side and myself seem to be so far apart in our judgment as to the proper limit of this discussion that I will now go on and present the views of the majority.

Mr. ROBERTSON (to Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey). Can you not agree with the gentlemen on the other side as to how much discussion there shall be? I think it is but fair and right to let them have a reasonable time to discuss this question.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON] and I agree entirely upon that. The only question is as to what is a reasonable time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What do you think is a reasonable time?

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I have already said that I think one hour is enough.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not think that is enough.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that if we could have two hours it would be sufficient.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I can not agree to two hours.

Mr. SPOONER. The question here goes to the merits of the case.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I do not understand how the merits of the case can possibly be brought into the discussion of this question.

Mr. ROBERTSON (to Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey). I think we shall save time by giving them the time they ask, because if we do not, they will probably filibuster and delay the decision longer.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no disposition on our side to delay it at all.

Mr. REED, of Maine. There is no disposition whatever to delay.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Will you gentlemen be satisfied with an hour on that side?

Mr. SPOONER. We want two hours.

Mr. ROBERTSON. If they want two hours, let them have it. We want only one hour on our side, because there is nothing in the case on their side. [Laughter.] What do you say to an hour and a half on each side?

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I make the suggestion that the debate be limited to two hours, one hour on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN] asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of two hours, to be equally divided between the opposing parties, the debate upon this question shall be closed and the vote taken.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I suggest to the gentleman that there should be an hour and a half allowed on this side. If he does not want more than an hour, he need not take it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN]?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I object.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Very well; then, Mr. Speaker, I will proceed. The Committee on Elections have reported this resolution giving the contestant and the contestee in this contested-election case further time to take testimony. The committee have not considered or reported the case on its merits. They come here simply for the passage of a resolution, in the nature of an interlocutory order, granting to these parties further time to take testimony. The committee retains jurisdiction of the case, and the simple question here is whether this further time shall be granted? The sitting member has a majority of 16, and the law of Rhode Island requires a majority to secure an election. In the testimony taken in this case on the part of the contestant there is disclosed by the evidence of thirteen witnesses a case of open corruption at the polls, some of these witnesses implicating personally the sitting member. The testimony, if true, shows open, barefaced corruption, the marshaling of men in files from the ballot-box and taking them down to the tavern to be paid the price of their corruption. We say in our report that if this evidence be true this House, in justice to its own dignity, must take notice of this case.

But, Mr. Speaker, the testimony has not been taken by the contestant within the time prescribed by the statute; and the contestee, taking advantage of that fact, as he had a right to do, claims not to have been represented at the time these witnesses were examined, and to have abstained from cross-examination of them, and also from producing witnesses to show that he and his friends have not been guilty of the corruption charged against them. This being the case, the majority of the committee have done—what? They have reported a resolution that the contestee should be allowed thirty days further time; and this time, let me say, has been fixed after consultation with his counsel; that is, I understand his counsel stated this time would be more than sufficient. We propose to give him thirty days within which to resummon these witnesses, cross-examine them, and to present any testimony that he may be advised it is necessary for him to produce in his behalf. We recognize that if the testimony already taken be true notice should be taken of it, but do not wish that he shall be condemned unheard.

On the other hand, the minority of the committee do what? They report two resolutions. In the first place, a resolution that Mr. Page, the contestant, is not entitled to the seat; and I propose, if necessary, to raise a point of order on that resolution that it is not before the House, that the question is still before the committee, that the case is not here for a decision on its merits. But they further say that although this testimony was not taken in time, although the contestee had the right to pay no attention to it, still they must regard it; that evidence of corruption is brought here, and that we must take notice of it. Therefore they recommend that a subcommittee of the Committee on Elections be directed to go to the State of Rhode Island and take testimony upon this question.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, there is presented on the part of the majority a proposition that this matter shall be sent back in order that these gentlemen may take testimony themselves; and on the other side we have a proposition that a committee or subcommittee of this House shall go to the State of Rhode Island and take testimony there.

Having thus stated the case, as it strikes me, I reserve the residue of my time, giving notice that I propose to move the previous question.

Mr. ELY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. ROBERTSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How long is this debate to last?

The SPEAKER. Until the previous question shall be ordered by the House.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I understand that I am entitled to the residue of my hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN] was entitled to the floor for one hour. He having resumed his seat, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELY], who made the minority report, is entitled to the floor for one hour, and has yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] for ten minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I desire that what I have to say on this question shall be said now, immediately after the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN]. I must confess to a great deal of surprise in listening to that gentleman's argument, coming as it does from a lawyer. Here is a plain provision of the statutes of the United States. The gentleman himself admits that the contestee did entirely right in refusing to appear and take testimony after the time had elapsed. If he did perfectly right why should this House subject him to further trouble and expense? He stands here, according to the gentleman from New Jersey, upon his right. Why should he be deprived of his right, which is secured to him by the statute of the United States? This is the reason which the gentleman from New Jersey gives: That the ex parte testimony taken out of time, taken when the contestant knew that he would not be answered, throws some slur upon the method of conducting the election.

It will be remembered that there is no provision by which the man who contests this seat can have it. There is no pretense that even upon his ex parte testimony the 1,500 plurality against him can be overcome. What then is the purpose of this proceeding as stated by the gentleman from New Jersey? To investigate, as he says, certain alleged frauds set forth in ex parte testimony taken on the part of the contestant. Now, in order to do this we are asked to avoid the plain way of doing it, which is to order a direct investigation, and to set a precedent by which we declare that the House will override the statute of the United States. I waive the question whether we have a right to do it or not, and admit, for the sake of argument, that we have the right. But I ask the House, which, judging from its action to-day and on the last election case, seems to be in a mood to treat these matters fairly, I ask the House to consider—and I have no other motive in regard to this question—whether it is wise and just to set a precedent which will add another horror to contested-election cases. I speak with some little feeling on this subject, for I do think that the course and conduct—the necessary course and conduct—of our present method of investigation in election cases is a discredit to us all. A contested-election case in which I was engaged, which cost $2,600 for its preparation on my part and $5,000 for its preparation on the other part, the Committee on Elections decided unanimously, and the House decided without a ripple of opposition, for there never was a shadow of foundation on which to base the contest. In addition to what the statute permits—a most outrageous permission—to go all over the world to take testimony on matters material and immaterial, matters relevant and irrelevant, we propose in this case to add to the precedents already established by forcing a man who stands upon his own right to go into a re-examination of an election case where the statute has decided it, and where the statute, if not mandatory, is one which commends itself to the reason and good sense of every member of this House.

I sincerely hope the House will not permit this to be done.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Permit me to state to the gentleman from Maine that the counsel in this case had agreed it should be changed to a different time from that prescribed by law.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I understand that not to be so. And the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN] distinctly in his opening stated the contestee in this case was acting as he had the right to act.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I took the position you take now.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I wish you had held to it. If you had, we would have been all agreed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have no doubt about that. I said I wanted to agree with you, so the House might understand it fairly and it should be all right.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is what I wished.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But there was a disagreement as to the time when the testimony should be taken; the counsel on one side said it should be one time, and the other side denied it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not so understand it. It was merely verbal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, if all that is involved in this case is the proposition as just stated by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN], there never would have been a minority report, and there never would have been any discussion of the case asked for by the Republican members of the Committee on Elections. But, as we view the case, the doctrine advanced by the majority of the committee, and which is summarized in their report to this House, is subversive of the principles which have governed election cases for the last ten years. I did not unite in the minority report, but am in full accord with the resolution offered that Charles H. Page, contestant, is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress from the second district of Rhode Island.

That the House may more fully understand the reasons for this statement and the position of the minority of the Committee on Elections, I call the attention of members to the undisputed facts in the case.

The secretary of state of Rhode Island certifies that in this Congressional election there were 15,476 votes cast, of which number the sitting member, Mr. Pirce, received 7,746—16 votes more than a majority of all the votes cast at that election; that Mr. Page received 5,995 votes, 1,744 less than a majority of all the votes cast.

Section 5, of Chapter II, Public Laws of Rhode Island, relating to the election of Representatives in Congress, is as follows:

> The ballots given in at such elections shall be returned to the General Assembly at its session next ensuing such election, and those given in each district shall be separately counted, and the candidate having a majority of the legal votes therein shall be declared elected, and shall be furnished by the governor with a proper certificate thereof.

You will observe from this, Mr. Speaker, that no man can be elected to Congress from either district in Rhode Island unless he has a majority of all the votes cast at the election. It is an admitted fact that Mr. Page received 1,744 votes less than a majority of all the votes cast at the election in question, and hence is in no position to ask the indulgence of this House to further his ambition; and, so far as his rights are concerned, this resolution offered by the minority of the committee should be adopted.

There is another reason, Mr. Speaker, why Mr. Page can not be permitted, in my judgment, to control this contest, and why the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections should be voted down and the report of the minority adopted. At the time of the Congressional election in November, 1884, Mr. Page was a member of the State senate of the State of Rhode Island. His term of office as such senator expired under the statutes of that State on the first Tuesday of May, 1885. The time fixed by law for the election of his successor was the first Wednesday of April preceding the Tuesday in May when his term of office expired by limitation. On the 8th day of January, 1885, the State board of Rhode Island, in pursuance of the laws of the State, awarded the certificate of election to contestee, William A. Pirce. More than two months after this, and with a full knowledge of the facts here stated, Mr. Page became a candidate for re-election to the State senate, and at the April election of 1885 was duly elected as his own successor, and, as he admitted to the Committee on Elections, duly qualified in May following.

Article IX of the constitution of the State of Rhode Island defines the qualifications for office. A part of section 6 of that article reads as follows:

> No person holding any office under the Government of the United States * * * shall act as a member of the General Assembly unless at the time of taking his engagement he shall have resigned his office under such Government, &c.

Mr. Page since the first Tuesday of May, 1885, has been performing the duties of State senator and is at the present time filling that position under an election held nearly six months after the Congressional election by virtue of which he has the effrontery now to claim a seat on this floor, and under an election, too, held more than a month after his term of office of Congressman commenced, if any reliance could be placed upon his claim to such election.

Now, what I maintain, Mr. Speaker, is that the conduct of Mr. Page since the election of November, 1884, is such that he should be held to have abandoned his right to contest for a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-ninth Congress. His acts have been such that he should be estopped from asserting any rights in the premises. If he had honestly believed that he was elected to Congress, as he now pretends, does any member think that he would have become a candidate for the position of State senator of Rhode Island after his term of office as Congressman commenced? He had served as State senator before this election and knew the qualifications for that office. He knew that by taking the oath of office in May, 1885, as senator in that State he had to resign any office he might hold under or by virtue of the laws of the United States.

As much as Democrats love office, and as anxious as they are to fill all the places, both State and national, I hardly think the members of that party in this House are prepared to say by their votes in this case that so small a man as Mr. Page, hailing, as he does, from the little borough of Rhode Island, in the general distribution of the loaves and fishes to the hungry members of their party, is entitled to two such honorable offices as he claims to hold. In his unbridled zeal for place and power he has made demands on his party associates which they must in all conscience repudiate. I do not understand that the members of the Elections Committee who joined in the majority report maintain that contestant has any right to the certificate of election now held by Mr. Pirce, or that they believe that in any event contestant will be benefited by adopting the recommendations made in their report to the House. Their position, if I understand it correctly, is that such charges of bribery have been made against the sitting member that an investigation should be had, and if the charges are found true, his seat be declared vacant.

The scope of the resolution accompanying their report to the House is broader and more comprehensive than this, however, and embraces a more important principle, in my judgment, than the one stated just now by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN]. It says upon its face that Mr. Page comes here as an honest contestant; that he comes here for the purpose of presenting a claim for a seat in this House to which he honestly believes he is entitled.

I say that is not fair to the members of this House who are not fully informed as to the facts in the case. In my judgment it ought not to be adopted, and with the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker, I will give some of the reasons upon which I base that judgment, and further reasons, too, why I think the true solution of this case is offered in the report of the minority of the committee.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON], in his remarks in response to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] who just preceded me, said that there was an agreement, a verbal agreement, between the parties to take the evidence in this case.

Section 107 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is as follows:

> In all contested-election cases the time allowed for taking testimony shall be ninety days, and the testimony shall be taken in the following order: The contestant shall take testimony during the first forty days, the returned member during the succeeding forty days, and the contestant may take testimony in rebuttal during the remaining ten days of said period.

Section 2 of chapter 119 of the statutes of 1875 is as follows:

> That section 107 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be construed as requiring all testimony in cases of contested election to be taken within ninety days from the day on which the answer of the returned member is served upon the contestant.

Under those sections of the statute law of this country all the contested-election cases decided by this House during the last ten years have been conducted. Their language is mandatory, and they have been upon the statute-book long enough for even a Rhode Island Democrat to know their provisions.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But did they not agree to waive that by consent?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will come to that after a while.

Now let us return to some of the unquestioned facts in the case. Mr. Page served his notice of contest on Mr. Pirce on the 5th day of February, 1885. On the 5th day of March, following, Mr. Pirce served his answer upon him. By the law just quoted Mr. Page should have taken all his evidence within the succeeding forty days, and within ninety days from that date all of the testimony on both sides should have been closed; and yet the fact is that no steps were taken by contestant to mature his case until the 11th day of June. On that day he gave notice to contestee that he would commence taking depositions on the 25th day of June, one hundred and twelve days after the serving of contestee's answer upon him and seventy-two days after the forty days allowed him by law for the taking of proof had expired.

As intimated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON], contestant attempts to avoid the crushing effect of these facts by setting up a pretended verbal agreement to extend the time to take the evidence with one Stephen A. Cooke, jr., contestee's attorney. Mr. Cooke denies ever having made such an agreement, and claims that the understanding was only with reference to the accommodation of himself and Mr. Page on any day or days during the time limited by law for taking the evidence.

I can best present the position of the parties on this disputed question by quoting their language.

Mr. Page's claim is as follows:

That on the 9th day of March, A. D. 1885, I met said Stephen A. Cooke, jr., in the Providence County court-house, in the city of Providence, R. I., in the room where the court of common pleas was held, within and for the county of Providence, which court was then in session, it being in the morning of said day, at the hour of about ten and a half o'clock; that said Stephen A. Cooke jr., then and there said to me that he had been and was employed and engaged by said William A. Pirce, as the attorney and counsel for said Pirce, to appear for him and to manage his contest with me for the seat in the House of Representatives of Congress as aforesaid, and that as the notice and the answer in said contest had been duly served, we would waive all other legal formalities of notice and taking of testimony in said matter and cause, and that I should let him know whenever I desired to take testimony in said contest, and that we would suit each other's convenience in regard to all other matters required to be done by law, and that no objections would be made or advantage taken by either of us because of not giving notice or taking testimony within the time designated by law and the rules of the House of Representatives in such cases; said Stephen A. Cooke, jr., stating to me at the time as a reason for making this agreement that his duties in court might prevent him from attending to this, and that my duties as a member of the judiciary committee of the senate in the Legislature of Rhode Island, of which I was then a member, would also prevent me from attending to other matters connected with said contest; that I then and there assented to what said Stephen A. Cooke, jr., suggested, and told him that I would be satisfied with that arrangement, as it would be very inconvenient for me to attend to this matter of the said contest for some time to come on account of my engagements in the senate of the Legislature, and that we would take no advantage of each other in the matter, and that whenever I desired to take the testimony I would notify him of the same in time as he suggested, only I said we would have it attended to before the meeting of Congress next December, and that in all other matters connected with the contest I understood that the formalities of law and the rules of the House of Representatives would be waived by us, and that the same should be attended to by us to suit our convenience, and that the same should have the same effect when done by us as if it had been done and performed within the time prescribed by law and the rules of the House of Representatives. To this Mr. Cooke said "All right." I further say that I did not have said agreement reduced to writing at that time, as said Stephen A. Cooke, jr., was then engaged in said court, and, as said Cooke and myself were on friendly terms with each other, I believed that the agreement would be kept on his part in good faith, and I dropped the matter and went to attend to my duties in the senate, and gave no more attention to it at that time. I further depose and say that the senate did not adjourn, and my duties in that body were not completed until April 24, A. D. 1885, and after the expiration of forty days from the time that said answer was served upon me. Upon the 26th day of April, 1885, I learned for the first time that said William A. Pirce intended to take advantage of said verbal agreement made by his said attorney, Stephen A. Cooke, jr., with me as aforesaid, and on the 27th day of April, 1885, I wrote said Stephen Cooke, jr., a letter, wherein I stated to him that we had made an agreement soon after the answer was served upon me which covered all matters connected with said contest subsequent to the service of said answer, and that I placed implicit confidence in his said agreement and relied upon the same until after the expiration of the first forty days after the service of said answer, and asked him if he now intended, and if said William A. Pirce intended, to take advantage of said agreement. On the 28th day of April, 1885, I received an answer to said letter from said Stephen A. Cooke, jr. (which I attach to this affidavit and mark the same Exhibit No. 1), wherein he admits that we did make a mutual agreement in regard to said contest.

This is Mr. Cooke's letter, mentioned in the above statement:

PROVIDENCE, April 28, 1885.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 27th instant is received. I thought it probable that during the taking of the testimony in the Congressional contest between Major Pirce and yourself court engagements might sometimes interfere with both of us. I therefore suggest that neither of us in such case compel the other to attend to the taking of the testimony, but would postpone it until another day, and that we should each consider the other's convenience in this respect. To this you assented, and I considered it a mutual agreement.

But there was nothing said which could lead you to infer that no consideration was to be paid to the express terms of the United States statute which limits and prescribes the time within which each party to the contest must put in his testimony. I should not have ventured to disregard the statute as to the time, and had the question even been suggested, should have said that the statutes should be treated as peremptory, and that it would not be safe for either party to regard it otherwise.

Intending to comply fully with the agreement that I did make with you, I can not permit you to enlarge that agreement to one not spoken of between us, and which I should not, under any circumstances, have made as attorney for Major Pirce. If any agreement was to be made which contemplated the extension of time for taking the testimony in this case, Major Pirce would have had to take upon himself the responsibility of making it.

Yours respectfully,

STEPHEN A. COOKE, JR.

CHARLES H. PAGE, Esq.

To my mind it bears no such construction as contestant attempts to put upon it. If there were any doubt about it, the following affidavit of Mr. Cooke settles it:

I, Stephen A. Cooke, jr., of the city and county of Providence and State of Rhode Island, on oath depose and say that I was employed by William A. Pirce, the contestee, in the matter of contest of Charles H. Page, contestant, for the seat of said Pirce in the United States House of Representatives for the Forty-ninth Congress, as Representative from the second Congressional district of Rhode Island, to draw his answer to said Page's notice of contest.

I further, on oath, depose and say that no agreement or understanding, express or implied, was ever made by me with said Page or with any other person to take testimony in said contest, or that testimony might be taken therein by either party outside of the time or after the time fixed for the taking therein by the statutes of the United States; that I was fully aware of the limitations of time upon each party, and regarded them as imperative and not to be ignored, varied, or waived in any particular; and that I never had any authority, express or implied, from said William A. Pirce to in any way or manner make or assent to any arrangement, agreement, or understanding whatsoever for the taking of testimony in said contest outside of or after the time fixed by the statutes for the taking of such testimony, and never in any manner assumed to exercise any such authority; that the only arrangement, agreement, or understanding I ever had with said Page concerning the taking of such testimony was (we both being lawyers) that if it should happen during the taking of testimony that an engagement of either of us in court should interfere with a day fixed for taking testimony in said contest, we would mutually accommodate each other by adjourning or postponing the day so fixed for taking said testimony so as to interfere as little as possible with our court engagements, which was agreed to in a conversation between said Page and myself in the court-house, where we casually met soon after the answer in said contest had been served upon said Page, and that we never had but one conversation in the said court-house respecting said matter, or elsewhere, to the contrary in any particular of the aforegoing.

And I further, on oath, depose and say that I never waived, or consented or agreed to waive, any of the formalities, notices, or conditions required to be observed or given in connection with said contest or the taking of testimony in the same; that the conversation between said Page and myself related exclusively to some possible court engagement, which neither of us could control, but which was then unknown, and that no reference or mention was made to said Page's duties as a member of the senate of Rhode Island, or of the judiciary committee of the said senate, or to any other matter or thing whatsoever than our professional engagements in court, as hereinbefore stated.

And I further, on oath, depose and say that the whole conversation between us contemplated the immediate attention to the taking of the testimony in said contest which was required by the statutes, and no suggestion or mention of any delay or postponement in the taking of the testimony by each party beyond the time so limited by the statutes was made by either said Page or myself at any time, and I make the statement immediately preceding, intending it to be broad, comprehensive, and explicit enough to deny anything to the contrary that may be stated, deposed, or sworn to by any person.

And I further depose and say, on oath, that after said conversation I was daily anticipating a notice of the taking of testimony on the part of said contestant Page, and arranged my other business at the time so far as possible that I, might attend to the taking of testimony in this contest within the time limited by the statutes; that I further directed said Pirce to let me know at once upon his receiving notice of the time when said Page should commence taking his testimony that there should be no delay in attending on my part, and that I also directed said Pirce to be ready to go on with his testimony immediately upon the expiration of the forty days to which said Page was first entitled as contestant, that he might be sure to get all his evidence in within his forty days, notwithstanding any unforeseen delays that might arise from time to time during said forty days.

And I further, on oath, depose and say that in anything said or deposed or sworn to by said Page or any other person to the contrary of the aforegoing the person so saying, deposing, or swearing to the contrary is entirely mistaken and incorrect, and that said Pirce never authorized my making the arrangement by me herein set forth, nor was he informed of it by me for the reason that the whole scope and operation of said arrangement made by me with said Page was for my personal professional accommodation, and did not affect, and was not intended, directly or indirectly, to affect, the right of said Pirce to require the observance by said Page of all the requirements of the statutes in such contests made and provided.

STEPHEN A. COOKE, JR.

Mr. Page attempts to sustain his position by filing with the committee the affidavit of Frederick C. Hull. But he is shown by contestee to be a man of questionable character and upon whose statements no reliance whatever can be placed.

As to whether there was a verbal agreement to extend the time to take the evidence must be determined from the statements of Messrs. Cook and Page, I think. There is no pretense that Mr. Pirce made any agreement, or that he had any knowledge of this pretended agreement with Cook. Viewed from all the light that can be obtained from surrounding circumstances, it seems to me that Mr. Cook's version of the agreement is the more reasonable. In the first place, it is not probable that Mr. Cook, who is indorsed by all parties as a man of character, would make an agreement to extend the time of taking proofs indefinitely, or, as Mr. Page claims, up to the meeting of Congress, without consulting his principal, Mr. Pirce.

Secondly. He states that he was familiar with the law relating to the time in which the testimony must be taken, and with such knowledge the probabilities are all against his agreement to override the statutes of the United States.

Thirdly. The Forty-sixth Congress, by a unanimous report of the Committee on Elections, condemned in the strongest language any attempt to prolong the taking of evidence in contested-election cases beyond the limit prescribed by law, and decided, without a dissenting vote, that a verbal agreement to extend the time would be disregarded.

It is but fair to suppose that this decision of the House was known to Mr. Cook and Mr. Page as well.

Again. Every lawyer knows that witnesses to any occurrence or transaction are clearer and better qualified to speak of what they saw and heard soon after such transaction or occurrence than they are months thereafter. Messrs. Cook and Page are both lawyers of experience, and this is an additional reason for adopting Mr. Cook's version of the agreement, i. e., that the time for taking the evidence was not to be extended beyond the ninety days.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Do not the committee now in this case offer to give the contestee ample time to take the testimony—all the time he desires?

Mr. HOPKINS. No, sir.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Do they not propose to allow him thirty days?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will show that is not sufficient.

Mr. ROBERTSON. They propose to allow him that time to contradict these charges of bribery by which it is alleged he holds his seat.

Mr. HOPKINS. The sitting member courts an investigation.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Then why does he not have it?

Mr. HOPKINS. Because he wants to have it in accordance with law.

Mr. ROBERTSON. You are very technical now, more so than you were the other day.

Mr. HOPKINS. By taking this course proposed by the majority of the committee you are sweeping away all the landmarks which have been set up to protect men in their rights, and that simply to benefit this Democrat from Rhode Island. What we contend for is that the law shall be obeyed. If there has been any bribery down there this House has the power to investigate it, as I shall show further on. I appeal to all fair-minded members if Mr. Page has not failed to satisfy you of the truth of his claim.

If this question were decided independent of party politics, I do not believe there is a man on the Democratic side of the House who would imperil his reputation for intelligence and candor by voting that Mr. Page had satisfied him of the existence of a verbal agreement, as claimed in his affidavit. But suppose, for argument's sake, there was a verbal agreement as sweeping in character as contestant asserts, what standing does that give him in this House? Upon what authority does he rely to sustain him in his position in prolonging this contest? I have shown that the law governing contested-election cases sanctions no such course as has been taken by contestant. The law neither authorizes nor recognizes verbal agreements to modify or abrogate the statutes of the United States. Whatever the power of this House may be to suspend the law in judging of the qualifications of its members, that privilege does not extend to persons not members, and in the conduct of their contest they must be governed by this law.

So if you were to consider a verbal agreement proven by contestant to extend the time to take the evidence, how will that advantage him? In all cases of this kind the public are interested as well as the immediate parties to the contest.

In commenting on an alleged agreement identical with this, the Committee on Elections in the Forty-sixth Congress, in the O'Hara vs. Kitchin case, use this language:

> One purpose of the statutes of the United States above cited was to compel parties to a contested election reasonably to prepare their case, so that it might have an early determination by the House.
>
> The evil results from permitting the parties at their own convenience to regulate the time of taking testimony, without regard to the statutes or the public interests, are too serious and obvious to require comment. In any case, if such agreements are to be regarded, they should be in writing and signed by the parties or their attorneys. This is the practice of the courts generally, and is founded on sound reasons. If oral agreements are recognized, then if they are denied by either of the parties at the hearing testimony must be taken and this collateral issue be first determined; and as the decision may be such as one of the parties did not expect, he may be put to the greatest disadvantage after the testimony on the merits of the case has been all taken.
> We think it of great importance in election cases that parties should understand absolutely that all agreements in contravention of the statutes of the United States, in regard to the taking of testimony to be considered at all, should be in writing, properly signed, and made a part of the record itself. Even then the policy of the law requires that they should not be regarded unless it appears that they were bona fide entered into, for an adequate and reasonable cause to be determined by the House of Representatives, either before or at the time of deciding the election case.

This report was approved by the House, as I have stated, without a division. It breathes the spirit of sound sense, as well as good law. It was a Republican in that case who wished to rely on a verbal agreement to extend the time in taking testimony, but the Republican members of the committee were too high minded and patriotic to be moved by party considerations on such a question, and united with the Democratic members of the committee in denying the right of the Republican contestant to any indulgence or consideration.

I am sorry to state that the example so worthily set by the Republicans of that House has not been followed by the Democratic members of this. The Democratic majority of this House is large enough, so they can afford to be, not perhaps generous, but at least just; they are in power and the people look to them to make and obey the law, not break it.

Reference has been made to the case of Bisbee, jr., vs. Finley, determined in the Forty-seventh Congress, as furnishing some excuse for the action of the majority of the Committee on Elections in their report to the House in this case. A careful examination and analysis of that case will show to any unprejudiced mind that there is no similarity between the two cases.

My time is limited or I should endeavor to demonstrate to this House that neither the majority of the Elections Committee nor the Democratic members of this House can shield themselves under the decision in that case in their vote to adopt the resolution offered in the majority report of our committee in this case.

I assert, what can not be truthfully or successfully denied or disproved, that the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections in this case is without authority of law and in violation of all precedents of the House. It is an innovation in the conduct of contested-election cases which is startling in character. If their report and resolution are adopted by this House all precedents and guides in these cases will be wiped away. No member whose seat is contested will know what to do; no rulings of the House or statutes of the United States will aid him, for this action will destroy them. He will be left to grope in the dark as best he may, until the Congress to which he is elected a member meets and agrees upon a set of rules to govern the contest for his seat.

Can the Democrats of this House afford that? The Democratic members of the Elections Committee are endeavoring to commit their party to the adoption of a course which will surely come home to plague them. It is a new departure they are making. It is a reasserting of the barbarous doctrine that might makes right. You Democrats have the power or might but not the right of this case.

To properly understand the resolution offered by the majority report, I will state that in the face of the array of facts I have shown against contestant's right to take any testimony, one hundred and twelve days after contestee's answer was served upon him he took the ex parte statements of forty-six persons.

The report of the majority of the committee treats those ex parte statements as evidence properly taken and to be received as a part of the record in determining whether Mr. Pirce is entitled to the certificate of election awarded him. It is a gross injustice to the sitting member. He had a right to rely on the statutes of the United States and the decision of this House I have mentioned, against the ill-advised and unwarranted course of Mr. Page. And yet for some purpose—I can not understand it if it be not a partisan one—every Democratic member of the Elections Committee by their report ask this House to override the law and put Mr. Pirce to the expense and trouble of cross-examining these persons and taking evidence in his own behalf. The course proposed is worse for Mr. Pirce than it would have been if he had waived all the considerations here presented and taken his evidence the same as though the ninety days had not expired.

In these contests the sitting member is not compelled to subpœna his adversary's witnesses to cross-examine them; they are brought before the examiner and required to remain after the direct examination until he has cross-examined them fully. This report of the majority of the committee entails no obligation on the contestant to produce his witnesses for cross-examination, but puts that burden upon contestee. No reason is given in the majority report for this, and in the discussion thus far no reason is given why Mr. Pirce's case is made an exception to the general rule. Suppose some of these witnesses whose statements have been taken by contestant can not be found, or willfully avoid the service of the subpœna upon them to appear and submit to a cross-examination, what position does that put the parties to this contest in, and what is to be done with such statements?

Will our Democratic friends still insist that they shall be treated as evidence to be used against the sitting member? The more you consider this majority report the more ill-advised and ill-timed it seems. It is a tangled web, and can only be straightened by a return to the plain highway so clearly marked by the statutes of the United States and the decisions of this House.

My learned friend from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN], in support of his majority report, says the House is a law unto itself; that members can not be bound by the decision of former Houses, or by laws found upon our statute-books. It is true that each House is the judge of the qualifications of its members, but that does not mean that rules adopted and statutes enacted to aid in determining such questions are to be arbitrarily set aside. No sound reason has yet been given for offering Mr. Pirce on the altar of experiment.

The Supreme Court of the United States determine what is and what is not good law in a given case. No appeal can be taken from their decision. They have the arbitrary right to say that a principle of law as old as the year books is not the law, or they can annul a rule of practice of the court which has been in existence since the days of Chief-Justice Marshall without giving any previous notice or reason to the public or to the profession. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how long would that great tribunal hold the confidence and esteem of the lawyers and the public? They would be justly condemned for their arbitrary rulings. So will this House deserve and receive the disapprobation, if not the contempt, of all fair-minded men if the arbitrary and unjust recommendations and resolutions of the majority report be adopted here to-day. It is claimed by those who favor the recommendations of the majority report that there was a misunderstanding as to what the agreement was, and that the House should invoke an equitable doctrine and permit Mr. Page to make out his case if he can.

I have already shown that this position is untenable. I desire, however, to add something further against Mr. Page's right to a hearing. By his own affidavit it is shown that on the 26th day of April, 1885, he knew that Mr. Cook denied his pretended agreement, and that Mr. Pirce repudiated it entirely. Now, what was his duty, if he had relied upon this alleged agreement and let the ninety days pass without taking his proofs? Manifestly he should have at once served notice upon Mr. Pirce that he intended to proceed at once to take all his evidence, and not only serve his notice but actually have taken all the testimony upon which he predicated his claim to the certificate of election, and then applied to this House at his earliest opportunity for an approval of his course. He might then have evoked some equities in his favor. As it is, his case has not a single redeeming feature. He permitted forty-three days to pass after he knew both Mr. Cook and Mr. Pirce denied his claim before he took any action whatever, and it was fifty-five days after he had notice of this position of contestee and his counsel before he took the evidence or statements of the witnesses in support of his right to a seat in this House. There is no reason or excuse for this long delay. He seems to rely upon the fact that this is a Democratic House, and that all he has to show is that he has been a good Democrat during all these years that that party has been in the wilderness, and he will be voted a seat, right or wrong.

The claim of bribery brought against the sitting member is a matter upon which I am informed he courts the fullest investigation. But in a charge so grave he ought to have the privilege accorded to all men in this country—that of facing his accusers when they make their charge. He is denied that in the majority report.

Why the report of the minority of the committee should be adopted is the fact that it disposes forever of Mr. Page's claim to a seat in this Congress, and then provides for the fullest examination of any charge that may be presented against the sitting member. It provides for the appointment of a committee whose duty it shall be to examine all charges of corruption made in the case, and upon that to determine the right of the sitting member to his seat. It reaches the same conclusion sought by the majority report; but in doing so follows law and precedents instead of overriding them.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, the candor and fairness of members will prevail, and the recommendations of the minority of the committee will be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER]. I understand I have forty minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. After the ten minutes the gentleman now yields are occupied he will have thirty minutes remaining.

Mr. SPOONER. I trust the House will not now depart from what in this Congress seems to have thus far been the just and judicial method of dealing with contested-election cases. We have seen here, during the present session—what, I regret to say, we have too seldom seen in the consideration of contested-election cases—gentlemen dividing, irrespective of party, as to each of them seemed proper, for the fair, judicial decision of the questions at issue.

If this case can be considered and dealt with in a similar judicial spirit; if gentlemen can be guided by the reason and the law, as justly and properly applicable to the facts thus far presented, I can have no occasion to doubt that the decision of the House will conform to law, good precedent, and consistency, and assist in pointing the way to a just consideration and disposition of contested-election cases.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN] who opened this discussion referred to the "testimony" taken by the contestant. I submit to the gentleman, in all fairness, that there has been no "testimony" taken in this case. There have been ex parte affidavits taken by the contestant, after the time had expired within which any testimony could be taken under the provisions of the law; my colleague, the contestee, protesting in writing, both to the contestant and the magistrate, against the taking of such so-called testimony, because the time limited by law had expired, and because any testimony taken at that time could not be lawful testimony within the provisions of the statute and under all former decisions of the Committees on Elections of the House of Representatives and of the House itself.

What did the contestee do when he received the notice of the proposed taking of this testimony? What should he have done? I put the question to the gentleman from New Jersey. I put it to the fair consideration of any gentleman in the House. What should the contestee have done when not only the forty days provided by the law within which the contestant was entitled to take testimony had expired, but the forty days succeeding within which the contestee was entitled to take testimony under the statute had expired, and the ten days in addition thereto within which the contestant, if he had duly taken his testimony-in-chief, would have been entitled to put in his rebutting evidence had also expired? I repeat the question, what should the contestee have done? He did what was alone open for him to do under the law. He pursued the only course he was entitled to under the law. He sent written notice of protest to the contestant against the taking of testimony, as proposed, after the expiration of the time fixed by law, and also served written protest upon the magistrate by whom, as he was notified, this testimony was to be taken, protesting against the taking of any such testimony and against the authority of the magistrate to take any such testimony outside of the provisions of the statute, and against the validity of any such so-called testimony, if taken.

The contestee stood upon the law; respected the United States statute, which he assumed meant something, and declined to appear at the taking of such testimony; but the contestant went on and took his ex parte affidavits in defiance of the law, and when this case was first presented for the consideration of the Committee on Elections here the counsel for the contestee moved to dismiss the case for the reason that there was no testimony upon which it could proceed.

These affidavits, taken wholly outside of the law and contrary to its express provision, are not legal testimony in this case, and are entitled to no weight or consideration as such. They were only printed under the express agreement (which appears at the very beginning of the printed record in the case) that their printing "shall not affect the right of either party," &c.; and I can not understand how the legal gentlemen upon the committee could permit the merits of the case to be affected in their minds by the contents of such affidavits, when the opposing party neither had, nor could have, an opportunity to examine or cross-examine the affiants—an opportunity and right always recognized and conceded.

What would any of the intelligent legal gentlemen on this floor, either on or off the Elections Committee, say if, having been brought into court in the trial of some case at law affecting as well their reputation as their property, they were met by ex parte affidavits taken contrary to law, and those affidavits were submitted to the court as testimony under which that case could be tried, no right or opportunity for cross-examination having existed or been had?

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I understood you to say "opportunity" for investigation.

Mr. SPOONER. I said "opportunity for cross-examination."

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. All this testimony was taken on notice.

Mr. SPOONER. Taken on notice, to be sure; but there was no authority to take any such testimony. It was not "testimony" under the law. It was ex parte affidavits taken in violation of law.

Mr. HALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPOONER. I have no time. I would be very glad to do so if my time could be extended.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman let me ask him just one question?

Mr. SPOONER. I can not be interrupted, because I have not the time. If the gentlemen will give me further time I will endeavor to answer all their questions, if I can.

Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the Elections Committee reported to the House, through their chairman, a bill providing for further limitations concerning the taking, printing, and filing of testimony in election cases. I did not at all object to the enactment of such a statute, but I took occasion to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Elections if he considered, and if the committee considered, that that bill if enacted into statute would be recognized as an efficient and valid law. I think the chairman intimated that he did so expect, and that such was the opinion and expectation of the Committee on Elections. I referred to it then, as I refer to it now, simply for the purpose of pointing out the well-taken position, as it seems to me, which I occupy here concerning the particular matter now under discussion.

In 1871 a statute was passed (being section 107 of the Revised Statutes) regulating the time within which testimony should be taken in contested-election cases, limiting the time on both sides to ninety days, and specifying the order in which it should be taken. As, however, that statute did not particularize with certainty the time when the ninety days should commence to run, two years later, in 1875, when that difficulty was recognized, another statute was enacted, providing "that section 107 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be construed as requiring all testimony in cases of contested election to be taken within ninety days from the day on which the answer of the returned member is served upon the contestant." In this case the answer was served upon the contestant on the 5th of March, and the notice to take testimony was not given until the 11th of the next June.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPOONER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELY] give me two or three minutes more?

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, as I have said, notice that he proposed to take testimony in this case was not given by the contestant until the 11th day of June succeeding, ninety-eight days after the contestee's answer had been served upon him, fifty-eight days after all the time for taking testimony by the contestant had entirely expired, eighteen days after the time within which if the testimony had been regularly taken the contestee would have been entitled to take any testimony, eight days after the time provided by the statute for taking all the testimony, not only in chief but in rebuttal; and the notice was to take testimony fourteen days later than the time when the notice itself was served; in other words, seventy-two days after the entire time had expired within which the contestant was entitled to take any testimony.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Did not the counsel agree to do away with that restriction?

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir; no such agreement is admitted.

Mr. Speaker, if the committee or this House finds any occasion to make inquiry in Rhode Island concerning this election, or any other election to which a pertinent inquiry from this House may be directed, both the contestee and myself and also the people of Rhode Island will welcome there a committee from this House or from any other properly constituted authority; and I believe we can promise in advance that when that investigation is made it will show those gentlemen and the House of Representatives and the country the kind and character of alleged facts upon which these ex parte affidavits in this case are based, and how much ground there is for charging either fraud or bribery or intimidation in our State. Now, gentlemen, all that we ask is that this matter shall be decided under the law and the statute.

In the Forty-sixth Congress, in the O'Hara vs. Kitchin case, which was just like this, the committee decided that they would not consider a case where the testimony was taken under an alleged verbal agreement that the legal time should be extended, which agreement was denied upon the other side. That case and this are on all fours. That case was decided by a report of the committee, in which Democrats and Republicans unanimously united, and that was in a Democratic House of Representatives. If we have laws, let us live up to them and respect their provisions; and not stultify ourselves, as a part of the law-making power, by refusing obedience and respect to laws which we ourselves have assisted in making and perfecting, and the justice and fairness of whose provisions no one has ever been disposed or is disposed to question.

Mr. ELY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Speaker, this case illustrates again how changing circumstances will change men's convictions. In the case of O'Hara vs. Kitchin, in which case the sitting member was a Democrat, the testimony was taken out of time under an alleged agreement, asserted on the one side and denied on the other, that the testimony might be so taken. The Democratic and Republican members of the committee filed a report as a precedent for all future proceedings of that kind—first, that testimony taken out of time under an alleged agreement would not be considered; and second, that a contest where the testimony was taken out of time should be dismissed. Now, when the sitting member is a Republican and the contestant is a Democrat we are told, under precisely similar circumstances, that ex parte testimony taken out of time shall not only be considered as testimony, but that the witnesses so testifying are not to be produced for cross-examination by the contestant, and that the contestee is to be allowed thirty days in which to hunt up those witnesses and cross-examine them if he can find them, and in case of his failure to find and cross-examine them, that this ex parte testimony is to be finally considered in determining the issues in this case.

This House, in a case of this kind, may not be bound by a law passed by a preceding Congress. Each House is by the Constitution the judge of the elections and qualifications of its own members. But people who are not members of Congress are certainly bound by the law. The contestant and the contestee in this case, citizens of the United States and of the State of Rhode Island, each seeking a seat here, were bound by the law of Congress—a law providing a method by which we may determine the elections of those who seek seats here, a law determining the method and the time of taking testimony upon which the House shall base its judgment as to whether a man was elected or not.

Here we have a case where the ninety days in which the testimony should have been taken are allowed to pass. Then upon hearing that there was a claim of waiver of time, a written notice was served that no such agreement had been made. Forty days more are allowed to pass, and no testimony is taken. In the mean time the contestant becomes a candidate for the State senate of Rhode Island, and is elected a member of that body—an office which, under the laws of that State, he can not hold if at the same time he holds an office under the United States. After his election to this office—forty days and more after notice that the limitation upon the time of taking testimony has not been waived—he goes on and takes the testimony which is filed and printed in this case. And we are told by lawyers that this is to be considered as evidence, and that if we want to have it combated, the sitting member must find the witnesses and cross-examine them upon depositions not taken in pursuance of law.

Now, I say that the resolution ought to have been to dismiss the whole contest. We ought to teach the people of the United States to be obedient to law. We ought ourselves to be submissive to law, and ought to hold all parties coming here to a strict adherence to it. But because some fellow has sworn that he sold his vote and has thereby discredited himself, when no one was present to cross-examine him, it is thought perchance that some political capital can be made out of that sort of talk; and we are to violate the law, depart from the regularity of proceedings because we have the power to do so, and are to require the sitting member to go and hunt up those men who have discredited themselves by swearing to their own rascality, to hunt up and cross-examine them, and in the event of his failure to do this the testimony of this set of scoundrels, taken without cross-examination, is to be presented here—for what? Not for the purpose of seating Mr. Page, who has 1,700 less than a majority of the votes, but for the purpose, in my judgment, of making a little political capital.

When a man comes into court and swears that he has committed a crime, that should immediately discredit him. When a man says that he has sold his vote for $2, it shows that he belongs to a class of men whose testimony would not be considered as having very much weight anywhere except in Congress. And when this testimony is purposely taken in such a way that the contestant knew the witnesses would not be cross-examined, it is further discredited; for I take it that men intelligent enough to receive the nomination of their party for Congress and the votes of their party friends at the polls, when they do a thing of this kind do it with a deliberate purpose; and in my judgment the deliberate purpose of commencing to take testimony in this case more than a hundred days after the time when the answer was served—commencing to take testimony after the contestant had abandoned his contest by accepting a nomination and election to another office—was that this ex parte testimony might be fixed up for some other object than the legitimate object of enabling this House to determine who was elected from that district in Rhode Island.

For one I am opposed to trifling with a case of this kind in any such way. If there has been any corruption, let a committee of this House go to Rhode Island and investigate it. Let that committee summon the witnesses and find out what they know about the matter; let that committee report upon the question of corruption; but let us not ask a sitting member to hunt up witnesses whose ex parte testimony is produced, to cross-examine them, and, if he should fail to find them, submit to have their testimony considered by this House in determining his right to a seat.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has seventeen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, the contending reports of the Committee on Elections present for the determination of this House problems of no inconsiderable importance.

In support of my motion to substitute the resolutions recommended by the minority of the committee for that of the majority I maintain—

First. That every party to a contested election is entitled to the protection of an orderly, well-defined, and stable course of procedure, and that such protection is denied to the sitting member in this case by the report of the majority.

Second. That the resolution recommended by the majority of the committee is unjust to the sitting member in other particulars, to which I shall invite the attention of the House, and is admirably calculated to defeat the ends of justice.

Third. That the contestant was not elected, and therefore has no standing before this House.

Fourth. That he abandoned his contest before he made any attempt to take testimony.

Fifth. That, if he were elected, as he claims, he has resigned and vacated the office.

The facts in the case appear to be as follows:

In the Congressional election in the second district of Rhode Island, 1884, William A. Pirce was returned elected, received the proper certificate from the governor of the State, and was accorded a seat in this House. The election returns, which appear to have been legally made, give Pirce 7,746 votes, Page 5,995 votes, Alfred B. Chadsey 1,500 votes, and all other candidates 235 votes. Pirce received 1,751 votes over Page. Page was in a minority of 3,486 votes. A majority is required to elect in Rhode Island. In this state of the poll, Page had the courage to claim that he was elected. He served his notice of contest on Pirce, and Pirce served his answer on Page within the time required by law. The service of Pirce's answer was made on March 5, 1885. At this point begin the non-observance and violation on the part of Page of the statutes governing contested elections, which has led to the reports now before the House.

Section 107 of the Revised Statutes limits the time within which testimony may be taken, and is as follows:

> In all contested-election cases the time allowed for taking testimony shall be ninety days, and the testimony shall be taken in the following order: The contestant shall take testimony during the first forty days, the returned member during the succeeding forty days, and the contestant may take testimony in rebuttal only during the remaining ten days of said period.

This section and that relating to the notice of contest are the most important in the statute concerning contested elections. Congress emphasized the importance of this particular section by defining more clearly and exactly the period of ninety days within which testimony may be taken, in section 2 of chapter 119 of the statutes of 1875, which is as follows:

> That section 107 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be construed as requiring all testimony in cases of contested election to be taken within ninety days from the day on which the answer of the returned member is served upon the contestant.

The earliest testimony in this case was taken on the 25th day of June, 1885, one hundred and twelve days from the day on which the answer of Pirce was served on Page, and seventy-two days after Page's time for taking testimony under the statute had expired.

Page sets up an oral agreement between him and Stephen A. Cook, jr., the attorney of Pirce, made at a casual meeting in the court-house in Providence, waiving all statutes and rules of the House of Representatives, and extending the time for taking testimony without limit, except that it be attended to before the meeting of Congress in December. Mr. Cook was Pirce's attorney. He is a lawyer in Providence of the highest character and standing. Mr. Cook, in the most explicit terms and under oath, denies that he made any such agreement. Page brings forward the affidavit of one Frederick C. Hull to corroborate his own. In reply Pirce files the affidavit of Charles C. Gray, which is as follows:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
Providence County, ss:

Charles C. Gray, of the city of Providence, in the county and State above named, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is personally acquainted with Frederick C. Hull, of said Providence, and that he has known him intimately for fifteen years, and acquainted with all his circumstances (having married said Hull's sister).

That it is well understood in the family that said Hull has for some years made his headquarters at the office of Charles H. Page, esq., attorney at law, and Democratic candidate for Congress in the second district of Rhode Island in 1884, and that he has been employed by said Page in various capacities and deriving therefrom most of his support; that prior to the election for Congress in 1884, in said second Congressional district of Rhode Island, said Hull presented at the printing office of which this deponent is superintendent a written copy of a spurious Republican ticket, to be used at said election; that said ticket was set up at said Hull's request, and an impression of said form taken and found to be like copy furnished by said Hull; the form was then delivered to said Hull and he took it away; the copy attached is the one taken from said form; notice of this fraudulent ticket was given in the Providence Daily Journal before said election.

CHAS. C. GRAY.

HENRY PITMAN,
Clerk U. S. Dist. Ct., R. I. Dist.

Republican Congressional Ticket.
Second District.
For Representative to XLIX Congress:
William H. Pirce, of Johnson.

Mr. Pirce's name is William A. Pirce. Comment on so plain a piece of villainy is superfluous. For cunning and wickedness this fraud was superlative. It merits, and I am sure receives, the condemnation of every member of this House. But be not too hard on this humble dependent on Mr. Page's bounty, this weak hanger-on of Mr. Page's office. Look beyond the tool to the man who uses it.

Looking to these affidavits, I venture to affirm that Mr. Page has failed to prove the agreement which he alleges. But if the contrary be successfully affirmed it must be admitted that it is an oral agreement, and is disputed and denied by the oath of a man of admitted integrity and honor. It has been decided by the unanimous voice of a committee of this House, a majority of whom were Democrats, that such an agreement was incompetent and could not be considered. I refer to the contested election of O'Hara vs. Kitchin, in the Forty-sixth Congress. The Committee on Elections in that Congress were a very able committee. The report in that case was drawn by Hon. William A. Field, now one of the justices of the supreme judicial court in Massachusetts, one of the ablest jurists of which our Commonwealth can boast. I invite the attention of the House to this very wise and well-considered report. The committee say, after citing the statutes to which I have called the attention of the House:

One purpose of the statutes of the United States, above cited, was to compel parties to a contested election seasonably to prepare their case, so that it might have an early determination by the House. The practice which has arisen of permitting parties by agreement between themselves to postpone the time of taking testimony without any previous authority of the House of Representatives, or any express ratification of it by the House, is an indefensible one, and has, in the opinion of the committee, been carried too far. In many cases it seems to be considered by the parties that they can do as they please about it; that the contest is a merely private one, and concerns no one but themselves. In many States the parties are in the habit of making agreements postponing the time of taking testimony as fully as if the contest were a private suit, and this practice has in some cases received the implied assent of the House of Representatives. It may happen, indeed, that from unforseen causes an extension of time may be necessary, and the House of Representatives may not be in session, and therefore no previous application can be made to it; but in such cases, if the parties agree to an extension of time, the agreement should be in writing, signed by the parties or their attorneys, and application should be at once made to the House of Representatives, when in session, for a ratification of such agreement.

The evils resulting from permitting the parties, at their own convenience, to regulate the time of taking testimony, without regard to the statutes or the public interest, are too serious and obvious to require comment. In any case, if such agreements are to be regarded, they should be in writing, and signed by the parties or their attorneys. This is the practice of courts generally, and is founded on sound reasons. If oral agreements are recognized, then if they are denied by either of the parties at the hearing, testimony must be taken, and this collateral issue be first determined, and as the decision may be such as one of the parties did not expect, he may be put to the greatest disadvantage after the testimony on the merits of the case has been all taken. The misunderstandings that often honestly arise from oral agreements are alone sufficient to justify courts in insisting that none but written agreements will, if questioned, be recognized. We think it of great importance in election cases that parties should understand absolutely that all agreements in contravention of the statutes of the United States, in regard to the taking of testimony, to be considered at all, should be in writing, properly signed, and made a part of the record itself. Even then the policy of the law requires that they should not be regarded unless it appears that they were bona fide entered into for an adequate and reasonable cause to be determined by the House of Representatives, either before or at the time of deciding the election case.

On this ground the committee decline to determine on the affidavits the question whether or not any such oral agreement as the contestant sets up was ever made, and consider the case as if there were no such agreement. The committee might, indeed, in a case where testimony had been taken out of time, but with full opportunity to the other party to cross-examine the witnesses and exhibit evidence in reply, and where it was evident that this had been fully done, recommend to the House, if they find sufficient reason therefor, that the testimony be considered as if taken in time; but such is not this case, and the only alleged ground for the delay in this case is that the dwelling-house of Mr. O'Hara was destroyed by fire, as well as all memoranda, facts, and information in writing that he had procured necessary to be used in the contest. The time when the dwelling-house was destroyed by fire is not stated in any of the papers, but it is said to have happened in March, 1879, and before the answer of the contestee was served on the contestant. This does not seem to the committee a sufficient ground for admitting testimony taken one hundred and ninety-four days after the service of the answer.

The committee, therefore, are of opinion that this contest should be dismissed, on the ground that the testimony was not taken in time. If the testimony is considered, which the committee think should not be done, the committee think it insufficient to establish the contestant's case.

The committee further say:

It is manifest from the notice of the contest and the answer that there were very grave and important questions in dispute in this election, and that the matters in dispute concerned a far greater number of votes than the plurality of the sitting member as given in the Congressional Directory; but on most of these questions there is no testimony whatever, one way or the other, and the little testimony that has been taken either has no significance at all, by reason of a want of testimony to connect it in any intelligent manner with the questions at issue, or from some other cause, or the testimony taken which is intelligible and can be applied to the case does not establish the case of the contestant. The committee repeat that in their opinion the evidence in this case should not be considered.

The minority of your committee very heartily concur in the reasoning and conclusions of this report. Had this decision come to us as an original proposition it would have received our approval. It has been in existence five years. It has, so far as I am informed, never been questioned, distinguished, or denied. Mr. Page did not plead ignorance of it. It was adopted by representative men of the two great political parties of the country. Surely a rule of procedure in which Democrats and Republicans concur without a dissenting voice must be grounded in correct principle. It was applied to a Republican contestant when there was no precedent for it, and the Democrat retained his seat. Now a Republican relies upon it, a Republican who made no agreement personally and whose counsel, a man as I have said of admitted purity and honesty, denies on oath that any agreement to waive the statute was made; such a man relies on the rule that you have made, and will you deny him the benefit of it? Will the Democratic members of this House hold that they maintain or discard a useful rule of procedure as it affects favorably or unfavorably one of their own political party? I know that they will not.

No higher or graver duty rests upon this House than the steady maintenance of a stable and impartial course of procedure in contested elections. In such contests the House sits as a high court of judicature. The determination arrived at in them is the most momentous that can interest a free people, involving as it does the right to be represented in this body by the person of their choice. No judicial investigation can be safely made, no cause between party and party can be safely tried, except in obedience to those forms and methods which have been sanctioned by time and experience. To a supreme and sovereign degree is this statement true where the tribunal is necessarily interested in the result.

The use of existing statutes and decisions by any party to promote partisan purposes or to forward the partisan interests of any man would undoubtedly be revolting to every member of this House. If we use them or discard them according to the requirements of party exigencies they cease to be faithful guides conducting us into paths of truth and become mere juggling fiends—

> That palter with us in a double sense;
> That keep the word of promise to our ear,
> And break it to our hope.

The power that we possess in these cases is gigantic in its sway. Naturally and worthily our sympathies go out warmly to a party associate. The temptation to find in his case an exception to general rules is strong and not easily resisted. We may claim that our high sense of honor and steadfast judgment will hold the scales of justice in equal poise. Undoubtedly they will do much. But our only safe reliance is on those general and equal laws enacted by the wisdom of Congress when no special case absorbed its attention, and those wise decisions which have received the approval of men of all political opinions.

It is said that the contested-election statutes are not absolutely binding on this House. Such a proposition is true only because there is no superior force that can compel obedience to them. What are these statutes? They do not attempt to control or limit any investigation which the House may be pleased to make concerning the elections, returns, or qualifications of its members. That would be in violation of the Constitution.

The right of this House to inquire into the validity of the election of one of its members is undoubted. No man would more jealously maintain and defend that right than myself. And in the minority report in this case we have provided for its exercise in an orderly and legitimate manner. The statutes under consideration are enacted not for the government of the House, but for the government of the parties to the contest. Their provisions are that the issue between the parties shall be made up in a certain manner and within a certain time; that the testimony shall be taken in a certain manner before certain officers and within a certain time; how it shall be returned to the House and opened; and that certain fees shall be paid to officers and witnesses. To assert that these statutes are not binding on the House is unworthy of an American citizen. This is a Government of laws and not of men. The report of the majority refers to the dignity of this House. What can be more derogatory to its dignity than the imperious exercise of arbitrary power? What can more surely or more speedily bring us into contempt in the minds of the people? We have, indeed, the power to override these wise and impartial statutes, but we have not the right. Such an act is contrary to the spirit of our institutions; it is repugnant to the genius of our people.

Sir, the assumption that these statutes are not binding on this House in election contests between party and party is irreconcilable with the language of the Constitution itself. "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members" is the language of that remarkable instrument. "The judge." What does the word "judge" imply? Does it mean an arbitrary, fickle, inconstant tribunal whose caprice or prejudice or revenge shall be substituted for the expressed will of the people? Does the Constitution invoke to its aid in the organization of this House a tribunal whose only guard and guide shall be political zeal or party animosity, or, it may be, real or fancied partisan wrongs? Does it even invoke the uninstructed conscience of a good man? Did the Fathers of the Republic intend any or either of these things? Oh, no! The framers of the Constitution—that instrument which the wisest living statesman of England, William E. Gladstone, has declared to be "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man"—weighed their words and knew their meaning. And when they declared that this House should be the judge of the elections of its members they intended to establish a tribunal which, like all other judges of whom they had any knowledge, should be governed by the well-established rules of law and such statutes as might be enacted for its guidance.

In accordance with these views of the law, I maintain that Mr. Page has no standing before this House, for these reasons:

First. That, applying the familiar rules of interpretation to this statute in contested elections between party and party, Mr. Page must take his testimony within the time limited by the statute or be forever barred as a contestant. No provision for waiving this limitation is made in the statute, either expressly or by implication. Provision is made in the statute for taking depositions without notice, and before classes of officers not named in the statute, by consent in writing of the parties, which consent in writing shall be returned with the depositions. Evidently Congress thought the limitation of time for taking testimony too important to be controlled by the parties.

Second. The agreement set up is an oral agreement.

This has been ruled insufficient by both parties in O'Hara vs. Kitchin.

Third. Mr. Page alleges no adequate or reasonable cause for making this agreement. Surely convenience of counsel is no reason for extending the limitation of the statute. To say that counsel could not attend to the taking of this testimony in ninety days is absurd. It is trifling with the rights of the people. Will you say that parties, for their convenience, may extend the time for taking testimony from ninety days to nine months? I trust not. The people and this House have some rights which contestants and contestees and their lawyers are bound to respect.

Fourth. The agreement set up by Mr. Page can have no validity until ratified by this House, on Page's application. The agreement is in his favor, and if it is to be ratified it should be done on his petition. He has made no such application, so far as I know; he has never authorized or requested the Committee on Elections to do it for him. It is true that before the committee Page made a partisan appeal to the Democratic members of the committee to help him on the ground that Rhode Island had not had a Democratic Representative for a long time, and probably would not for a long time to come unless they put their shoulders to the wheel. But he relied then and always on his alleged unauthorized and unratified agreement. Shall every statute regulation, every rule of evidence, all orderly proceeding be rejected and repealed that this man, who only received 5,995 votes out of 15,476 votes, may make a contest for a seat in this House?

Fifth. Page was notified by Cooke on the 28th day of April, 1885, that he, Cooke, never made the agreement claimed by Page. Surely, with this knowledge, Page ought to have made haste to take his testimony; yet he delayed fifty-three days before he attempted to take a word of testimony. The statute limited him to forty days. Thus he knowingly and intentionally violated the spirit and letter of the statute. Will you sanction this also?

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the resolution offered by the majority of the committee. The objections to it are patent and grave. I claim that it is utterly unfair and unjust toward Mr. Pirce, the sitting member, and, in my judgment, it will, if adopted, defeat the ends of justice.

First, as to time. Under the law on the statute-book, a law which we have sanctioned this year by the adoption of an amendment to it, a law which has been on the statute-book for many years and is known to all the people of the land, a law which is just and reasonable and which provides an orderly method of conducting these contests, the contestee cross-examines the contestant's witnesses in contestant's forty days and then has forty days for taking his own testimony. The resolution requires him to resubpœna and cross-examine contestant's witnesses and take any testimony he may desire in thirty days from the passage of the resolution. Suppose the resolution passes to-day, certainly Mr. Pirce acting with great diligence could not be expected to return to Rhode Island, secure a proper officer to take testimony, procure a subpœna and have it served on one of the witnesses before day after to-morrow. The witness must be served with the subpœna five days before the day on which his attendance is required. Thus at the earliest seven days of the thirty are exhausted before a word of cross-examination can be taken. And this leaves no margin for any of the inevitable accidents and delays necessarily incident to legal proceedings. Of the twenty-three days remaining three at least are Sundays. He then has twenty days to cross-examine how many witnesses? Forty-six. And in the same time also to examine in chief his own witnesses and submit them to the cross-examination of Mr. Page.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the members on the other side of this House desire to deal justly with Mr. Pirce. You hold it practically in your hands to do with him as you will, but I believe you desire all the more on that account to be just to him. I desire to inquire if there is a lawyer in this House who says that this is a reasonable time for this great work. Now, what is the action of our friends of the majority of the committee when they come to deal with the contestant? I maintain and ask you, with all the emphasis of which I am capable, to aid me in maintaining that in this contest the contestant and contestee shall be placed on a par, although the one is in the minority and in your hands to do with as you like, while the other is in the majority. I ask, what is your action when you come to deal with the contestant? Do you restrict him at all? Oh, no. He is given the full statute time of ten days within which to put in his rebuttal. It is not fair, is it?

Mr. ROBERTSON. But you do not want any fairness about it.

Mr. ELY. And now, second, the resolution deprives Mr. Pirce of the right of meeting these witnesses face to face on their direct examination. This is a most important right, as every lawyer knows. What lawyer employed to take a deposition would absent himself during the taking of the direct testimony? Everybody knows that he would be utterly derelict in his duty and that the whole tone and tenor of the testimony would be much more favorable to his opponent than if he were present at the time and by his presence preserved that equilibrium of influence and restraint which is so essentially necessary to the due and proper conduct of all legal proceedings. It is said that the testimony of the contestant discloses wholesale and open bribery, implicating even the contestee personally.

All the more reason why the contestee should be present at the examination in chief. Here is a man who was born and has passed a long life in the district which he now represents in Congress. He has time and time again been called by his neighbors to fill posts of honor and of trust, and now at the age of sixty-two years he is charged with the revolting crime of bribery, and yet, without fault on his part, he is to be deprived of the privileges accorded to the meanest criminal. I say without fault. Mr. Pirce made no agreement, and therefore can have broken none. The agreement alleged is denied under oath of an honorable attorney. Page, after he knew of the denial, allowed the statute time of forty days to run by before he attempted to take testimony. In his notice to take testimony he recognized that he was bound by the forty days' limitation. Pirce seasonably served his protest against taking testimony on Page. Pirce relied on the statutes and the interpretation which had been put on them by Democrats and Republicans alike. Under the circumstances of this case it was peculiarly fitting that he should rely on them; to now make these affidavits testimony would do a great injustice to Pirce, and indeed would in my judgment defeat the ends of justice in this case.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that all the members of the Committee on Elections agree that in no event was Mr. Page elected a member or the House. I trust that if I am mistaken in that particular I will now be corrected.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. That question is now before the committee, and not here. I do not know that it has been passed upon there as yet.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, that question, I respectfully reply, is not still before the Committee on Elections, but is here for the decision of this House.

Mr. ROBERTSON. You are wrong.

Mr. ELY. If there is any doubt about that, it is perfectly clear that Page was not elected a member of this House. In a poll of 15,476 votes he received only 5,995 votes. He claims to have been elected. A majority is required to elect. He is in a minority of 3,486 votes. In furtherance of his claim he has taken what the majority of the committee are pleased to call testimony. In taking this so-called testimony no bounds have circumscribed his powers. He has not been limited in time. No presence of opposing party or counsel has objected to or prevented the asking of a single question, or checked the reckless utterances of the swiftest witness. No cross-examination has intervened to diminish or break the force of a single word of these affidavits. He has called every witness who would or could testify in his favor. The last witness closed his testimony on July 20. The law requires that testimony when completed shall be sealed and sent to the Clerk of the House of Representatives "without unnecessary delay;" yet Page kept this testimony open and unsealed until September 2—forty-three days. He was evidently looking for further testimony, but found none.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Was it not all taken upon notice?

Mr. ELY. I will come to that in a minute.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Answer that.

Mr. ELY. For two months he delayed, but could find no other testimony. Now it is not his purpose to put in any other testimony in his favor. If it were it could not be found. With all these unheard-of circumstances in his favor what is the result? Waive all the formalities, waive all the leading questions, waive all objections to hearsay testimony, accept all that is irrelevant and immaterial as relevant and material, and then apply to it the propositions of law most favorable to Page, and yet he is not elected. Strike out Pirce's entire vote in every town where there is a word of evidence of bribery, and then Page is thousands of votes behind. Therefore, I submit, if I am correct in this statement of facts, that the first resolution reported on the part of the minority of the committee, and which I ask to have substituted for the resolution of the majority, should be adopted.

Page evidently abandoned this contest, and after a lapse of some months attempted to resume it. This he could not lawfully do. His acts can be accounted for on no other hypothesis. He not only delayed for many months without any action in his contest, but he held and accepted offices incompatible with that of Representative. At the date of the November election, 1884, Page was a member of the senate of Rhode Island. He continued to hold his seat and act and vote as a senator after the 4th day of March, 1885. In April, 1885, he became a candidate for re-election, was elected a member of said senate, accepted the office, and has during this session of Congress acted and voted as a member of said senate. This was in direct violation of the constitution of Rhode Island if he is and has been since March 4, 1885, as he now claims, a member of this House. The constitution of Rhode Island, article 9, section 6, is as follows:

No person holding any office under the Government of the United States, or any other State or country, shall act as a general officer, or as a member of the General Assembly, unless at the time of his taking his engagement he shall have resigned his office under such government; and if any general officer, senator, representative, or judge shall, after his election and engagement, accept any appointment under any other government, his office under this shall be immediately vacated; but this restriction shall not apply to any person appointed to take depositions, or acknowledgment of deeds, or other legal instruments by the authority of any other State or country.

But these acts have a more serious effect on this contest than a mere indication of the contestant's intention.

When Mr. Page, under his election to the State senate of Rhode Island, accepted said office and qualified and continued to hold and act in said office after the assembling of Congress, at the time appointed by law, on the first Monday of December, 1885, he thereby resigned and vacated his office of Representative. No law obliged Mr. Page to accept the office of Representative in Congress, nor, having accepted it, forbade him to resign it. No law obliged him to accept the office of State senator. He could accept or decline either at his own will. The two offices are incompatible not only by the expressed provisions of the constitution of Rhode Island but by the nature of these offices. This proposition would seem to be too plain for argument; but I will cite in support of it the case of State vs. Buttz, 9 S. C., 156, where it is held that the office of solicitor of the first judicial circuit is incompatible with that of Representative in Congress. The learned judge, in delivering his opinion, says:

What, then, does constitute incompatibility in offices? In 5 Bacon Abridgment Title Offices, K, we find the rule laid down upon the authority of Lord Coke in these words: "Offices are said to be incompatible and inconsistent so as to be executed by the same person, when, from the multiplicity of business in them, they can not be executed with care and ability; or when their being subordinate and interfering with each other it induces a presumption they can not be executed with impartiality and honesty."

And, in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, in a note to section 166, it is said that—

Incompatibility in offices exists where the nature and duties of the two offices are such as to render it improper from considerations of public policy for one incumbent to retain both.

Applying either of these definitions to the case in hand, and it is very manifest that the two offices in question are wholly incompatible, it certainly needs no argument to show that "the multiplicity of business" in each of these offices is such as to render it not only impossible for the same person to perform the duties of both "with care and ability," but impossible often, and very often, too, to perform them at all. It is equally certain that the nature and duties of these two offices are such as that every consideration of public policy renders it improper for one incumbent to retain them both, and it is none the less certain that the duties of the two offices are such that the performance of the duties of the one necessarily involve the neglect of the duties of the other.

Here are two offices held under two distinct governments; the duties of the one are to be performed in Washington, while those of the other are to be performed in this State. To perform the duties of the one the officer must be in Washington, while to perform the duties of the other he must be in this State, and that, too, at the very time when the duties of the other call him to Washington.

These remarks of the court apply with even greater force to Page vs. Pirce than to the case then under consideration.

Thse offices being then incompatible, Mr. Page by accepting that of senator in Rhode Island resigned and vacated that of Representative in Congress. This is well settled by the best legal writers and by courts of last resort both in England and in this country. In a late case in my own State, Commonwealth vs. Hawkes, 123 Massachusetts, 525, the opinion being written by Chief-Justice Gray, now one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the law is thus stated:

By the common law, when two offices, or public trusts, are incompatible with each other, a person holding the one is not disqualified to be appointed or elected to the other, but his acceptance of the second office is in law an implied resignation of the first, whenever it may be resigned by the mere act of the incumbent, without the assent or concurrence of a superior authority.

As I have said, no assent or concurrence of a superior authority is required in this case. This principle applies not only where the second office is the superior and more important office, but also where it is not. This is settled conclusively in the case in England of Milward vs. Thatcher, 2 Term Reports, 87. The language of Mr. Justice Buller in reference to the plaintiff in that case is so applicable to Mr. Page in this case that I make a brief quotation. Says that eminent judge of the plaintiff:

I have no doubt but that his intention was to keep both offices; but if he be mistaken in law and choose to accept the last office, he must abide by the consequences; for it is his own act.

Acceptance of an incompatible office, won under a void election, puts an end to the first office; and the officer on being ousted from the second office can not be restored to the first. This is settled in the case of Rex vs. Hughes, 5 Barnewall & Cresswell, 886.

It will probably be claimed that while this rule of law is decisive on a person whose seat is uncontested, it is not on a contestant. This is, as it seems to me, "a distinction without a difference." Surely if it does not apply to a contestant, it would not to a contestee. Suppose that Mr. Pirce had been elected a member of the senate of Rhode Island in April, 1885, and had accepted the office, would any man have claimed that he had not thereby resigned and vacated his office of Representative in Congress? And if this conclusive inference of law is applicable to him whose seat is contested, does it not equally apply to him by whom the seat is contested?

The cases of General Schenck and General Blair, decided in the Thirty-eighth Congress, are not in conflict with these views. Those cases turned on the peculiar phraseology of the Constitution of the United States, that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." And it was held that no person was such "member," within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution, until he had an opportunity to qualify and take his seat. The case before us does not come under this clause of the Constitution of the United States, but under the constitution of Rhode Island, and under the law relative to holding incompatible offices which I have cited. The constitution of Rhode Island declares that "no person holding any office under the Government of the United States" shall act as a member of the General Assembly. There can be no doubt that a Representative in Congress holds an office under the Government of the United States.

But if authority be necessary, it has been so decided by the court of last resort in the State of New York in the well-considered case of Pope vs. Common Council of Brooklyn, 77 New York, 503. Section 25 of the Revised Statutes of the United States prescribes the time of election of Representatives "to the Congress commencing on the 4th day of March next thereafter." It is from this date that the Representative holds the office. From this date his compensation begins, and under the law he receives it monthly if his credentials are duly filed, although no session of Congress be held for many months (section 38 of the Revised Statutes). Can it be said that the United States pays a Representative in Congress in advance for services in an office which he does not hold, and may never hold? Is there any doubt that a Representative may resign his office after the 4th day of March on which the Congress to which he has been elected commences, and before any session of such Congress? And if he may expressly resign it may he not by implication? Certainly he may. Indeed, a proper analysis of the two proves them to be the same; differing only in the instrument employed to manifest the resignation of the officer. In the one case he uses words; in the other, acts.

If, then, Mr. Page was elected, as he claims, a member of this House in November, 1884, he began to hold his office on March 4, 1885. The vote of the people made him a Representative. The certificate of the governor neither makes him nor unmakes him. His term of office was two years. From March 4, 1885, he was liable at any time to be called upon to perform the duties of a Representative in this House. At any time after he qualified as a State senator the two offices were liable to conflict, and at some time inevitably would conflict. They were incompatible. Page's acceptance of the office of State senator determined his claim to that of Representative in Congress. On any other theory he might hold the former office until the very moment when he should be awarded a seat in this House, then resign his seat in the State senate, and leave it vacant and his district unrepresented until a new election could be held. Such an idea is repugnant to governmental policy.

If it be maintained that Page could delay making his choice between the two offices until a session of Congress began, it places him in no better position. Congress has been in session for many months and he has not made his choice. He has been here in Washington prosecuting this contest repeatedly to the neglect of his duties as State senator, thus establishing by his own acts the validity of my argument in this case. No; a man can not hold in his hand one of two incompatible offices while he litigates for the other. He can not thus play fast and loose with the people. If he claims that he is elected to two incompatible offices, he is bound to choose between them. He can not hold a title in fee-simple in the one and a mortgage on the other. If he be mistaken and choose improvidently, he must abide the consequences, for it is his own act.

For these reasons I maintain that the resolutions recommended by the minority of the committee should be substituted for that of the majority. In my judgment the affidavits which have been printed and on which the majority of the committee rely, are open to the severest criticism, but I pass them without comment. I interpose no objection to the most thorough investigation. Let it be done in conformity to the law and in a manner calculated to develop the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and I shall be content.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I now take the floor in my own right, and yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, this contest turns upon charges of intimidation and bribery. Rejecting all illegal and hearsay testimony, it appears from the evidence produced by the contestant that the sitting member himself personally corrupted and bribed some of the voters. At one precinct it appears from this evidence that there were one hundred and eighty-seven men bribed by the sitting member's agent. There was thus revealed to the committee a case of personal corruption charged against a member of the House. But it was said on the other side of the case that the evidence by which this charge was to be established was taken after the expiration of the statutory period.

In this state of the case the question was whether we should dismiss the case, investigate it further, or decide it upon the record which we had. I for one am in favor of adhering to the statute as a convenient rule of practice in all ordinary cases. But although this case justifies a departure from the statute, we decided to recommend another opportunity to the sitting member for the defense of his honor. We propose to give him this privilege, although he refused it when tendered by the contestant. If there is error in the action of the committee, in my judgment it is an error on the side of generosity to the sitting member. So far from any wrong being contemplated, we propose an act of grace and magnanimity.

Reference has been made to the case of O'Hara vs. Kitchin, and the gentlemen who opposed the resolution offered by the majority plant themselves on the authority of the report in that case. An examination of that case will show that it has very little pertinency or relevancy to this discussion. In that case the committee distinctly found that they could not ascertain from the record whether or not notice of contest was served in time. They further found that the evidence taken out of time did not show that the contestant was elected. And finally they found that the evidence had not been taken within the statutory period nor on the faith of a written agreement. For all these reasons the committee recommended a resolution against the contestant. And nothing appeared against the character of the sitting member or the conduct of the election, and no other extraordinary circumstance suggesting the propriety of further investigation.

But, Mr. Speaker, in the Forty-seventh Congress, following that in which the case just mentioned was decided, another precedent was set by the Republican party alone in the case of Bisbee vs. Finley. I recall with some bitterness of regret that remarkable case.

The statute allows the contestant forty days in which to take testimony-in-chief. It also allows forty days to the sitting member to reply, and then ten days are allowed for the contestant's evidence in rebuttal. After the forty days allowed to Mr. Bisbee had been fully exhausted he continued arbitrarily to take testimony within the forty days allowed to Mr. Finley in his absence and during the time when the latter was hunting up his witnesses and preparing his evidence. I insist that that was a far graver dereliction from the statute than that which appears in this case. It was not a taking of testimony after the statutory period had expired, but it was a taking of testimony within the period which the law allowed to the sitting member.

Every Republican member of the committee, as if to emphasize his assent, signed a report which stated that the statute is merely directory and that the committee would be bound by no statutory rule, and they reported the evidence to the House, taken under these extraordinary circumstances, as a part of the basis on which they excluded General Finley from his seat. That case distinctly overrules the O'Hara and Kitchin case. Mr. Bisbee was seated in this House on testimony taken under these most extraordinary circumstances. In other words, the case was tried on such evidence, and no opportunity was tendered the sitting member by the committee or the House such as we offer in this case.

Now, what do the minority of the committee propose? They, in the first place, ask the House to declare that the contestant is not entitled to the seat. They propose on this state of the case to adjudicate Mr. Page's title to the seat, and then to recommit the case to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to send a subcommittee to the State of Rhode Island to take testimony, with the contestant excluded.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say here quite frankly and honestly that I have no wish to dismiss from this case the prosecutor of it. I want him to remain on the record.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TURNER. For very obvious reasons, the contestant is more familiar with the facts than anybody else, understands better their scope and character, and knows more about the residence and situation of the witnesses. He is the man who is interested more than any one else in the result, and like the prosecutor in a criminal case, to remain a party to the case, and have the right to confront the sitting member at every point during the further investigation of the case, so that it shall not again be ex parte.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. TURNER. What does the gentleman from Rhode Island desire?

Mr. SPOONER. I simply desire to inquire, inasmuch as the contest in this case is not in regular form according to law, whether the gentleman does not consider that it is unfair and improper to limit the time within which this examination is to be had to thirty days instead of the forty days as provided in the statute, and I suggest that the thirty days under the terms of the resolution——

Mr. TURNER. I yielded only for a question. I can not give up to the gentleman the whole of my time.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not know that the gentleman's time was limited.

Mr. TURNER. My time is limited. I want to say to the gentleman now, that I am entirely satisfied that the time allowed under this resolution for the taking of testimony is quite ample. In fact, I will state further to the gentleman, that, so far from there being any hardship contemplated by this action, it allows, in my judgment, an unusual and extraordinary opportunity to the sitting member, considering the precedents that have been set by the Republican party in the past.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, the gentleman understands——

Mr. TURNER. What will the gentleman have further?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. TURNER. I can not yield. I have but a few moments more.

On reviewing this whole case, in the kindest spirit toward the other side, I wish to say in my judgment the evidence heretofore taken in this case seems to establish a condition of facts which ought to invoke the fullest scrutiny.

Instead of the usual method which we propose, the minority insist that the investigation shall be under the direct auspices of the Committee on Elections. I protest against it, sir. We have too many duties to perform in this House, we have too many responsibilities to our immediate constituents, to permit us to vacate our seats and to go to a distant State to investigate a question of this sort, when the machinery already provided by the law affords the amplest, fullest, and most deliberate opportunity for both parties to be heard. I thank the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN] for the opportunity he has afforded me.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. How much more time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirty-seven minutes remaining.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY].

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, this case, sir, is within the compass of the proverbial nutshell, and it will not be necessary to pursue the devious course of the argument of my colleagues on the Committee on Elections who have addressed the House upon the other side. Some of them have introduced topics that are entirely foreign to the question now before the House. My friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] followed by the other honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], has undertaken to put the vehicle before the quadruped [laughter], and has addressed himself to the consideration of the question whether or not the contestant in this case could legally hold a seat in this House by reason of his having been a member of the senate of the State of Rhode Island. That is a question that may properly be considered when the case comes up on its merits, but I commend to the consideration of my friends the homely adage that "it is time enough to cross the bridge when you come to it," and I suggest that it is unnecessary to embarrass the issue which we have now before us for consideration by the discussion of any question of that kind.

What is this case, sir? We have here a regularly instituted election contest. Notice of contest was duly given, an answer was duly filed within the time prescribed by the statutes, and within four days after the filing of the answer a gentleman, who is said to be one of distinction in the legal profession (and, from what appears in this record, there is no question concerning either his legal acumen or astuteness), meets the contestant in the Providence County court-house, in the city of Providence, R. I., and, addressing himself to that gentleman, says that he is employed by the contestee, Mr. Pirce, as his attorney in the Congressional election contest pending between the latter and Mr. Page, and has filed his answer; that he is engaged in court and liable to continue to be so; that the contestant himself is a member of the State senate, and will probably be occupied there in the discharge of his duties as a State senator during the period when he would be required to give his attention to the taking of testimony in the case, and therefore he proposes to the contestant that they shall make an agreement as to time for their mutual convenience.

Be it remembered that there is no question in reference to the authority of this attorney, Mr. Stephen A. Cook, who himself testifies to the fact that he was the regularly constituted attorney of the contestee in this case. What follows? Mr. Page, the contestant, files an affidavit stating that then and there, at the instance of the attorney of the contestee, he, the contestant, entered into an agreement by which it was concluded between them that, for their mutual convenience, they would waive any question in reference to the time when the testimony should be taken, and that each could give the other due notice when he desired to proceed before any testimony was taken.

Mr. Page corroborates his own affidavit in reference to this agreement having been made by the affidavit of a gentleman named Hull. It is undertaken here to destroy the credibility of the affiant Hull by filing the affidavit of another gentleman setting forth that Hull came to his printing office and asked him to print for him a ticket which he denominated a "spurious" ticket. The ground of its being denounced as "spurious" is that it was headed "Republican ticket." I am happy to find our friends on the other side characterizing such tickets as spurious. [Laughter.] I wish they would so regard all such tickets, not only in the State of Rhode Island but throughout all the States of this Union. [Continued laughter.] If they had done so, I would not have been in the unhappy predicament in which I was placed the other day when I was constrained to vote against my political and personal friend Hon. Frank Hurd.

Now, here are two affiants who state that there was a parol agreement. What does Mr. Cook, the attorney of the contestee, say? He undertakes to deny the effect of the stipulation he made by stating that according to his understanding, as he expresses it, there was no agreement to extend the time beyond that prescribed by statute. What does he say, however, in reference to the exact terms of the agreement which he did make? Here is his exact language, as contained in his letter to the contestant, which is embodied in the record in this case. He admits the time and place of making the agreement; he admits that an agreement, which he characterizes as a "mutual agreement," was made; and the phraseology which he adopts in describing that agreement is this:

> I therefore suggested that neither of us in such case compel the other to attend to the taking of the testimony, but would postpone it until another day, and that we should each consult each other's convenience in this respect. To this you assented; and I considered it a mutual agreement.

We have then the testimony of Mr. Page himself, and of the corroborating witness, Hull, and the express admission of the attorney of the contestee to the effect that such an agreement was made.

Our friends on the other side, chary as they are of the reputation of the contestee now occupying a seat in this high and honorable body, say that it will be an infringement upon his rights if we give effect to that parol agreement; and they claim there is authority for this position. Notwithstanding numerous instances in which the House has recognized the parol agreements in regard to taking testimony and has itself extended the time, they have appealed to the case of O'Hara vs. Kitchin, and say that it is authority for refusing absolutely to recognize or give any effect to such agreements.

Let us see how that is. Why, sir, in the first place, while it is true that there a contest was instituted by O'Hara against Kitchin, and pending for a time in this House and reported on by the Committee on Elections, it was never decided here. The report was simply ordered printed and never acted on. (Digest of Election Cases, Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, page 378.) But even if the report had been adopted by the House, what were the facts involved and the conclusions drawn? No shadow of claim was made there of there having been an agreement by parol or otherwise to extend the time. It was claimed that there had been an oral agreement by Kitchin "to make a case without taking testimony." This was not done, and Kitchin denied the agreement under oath, and supported himself by the affidavits of two other persons.

O'Hara went on and took testimony out of time; relied upon the alleged agreement as an excuse for not taking it in time, and asked the committee on his own unsupported affidavit as to O'Hara having "agreed to make a case," to authorize the taking of testimony after the time prescribed. The committee very properly refused. But in giving a summary of their reasons for so doing and against the propriety of parol agreements being relied on or given effect to without there being sufficient reason therefor, they expressly recognize the fact that it was the practice. They say, "The practice which has arisen of permitting parties by agreement to postpone the time of taking testimony * * * has, in the opinion of the committee, been carried too far." If such a practice had arisen would the mere opinion of a committee overturn it? Would it be allowable to cite the opinion of a committee as authority against the action of the House?

But that committee reasoned only against such practice being general, and against being resorted to without there being some sufficient cause. In this they were doubtless right. They expressly recognized the doctrine, however, that there are cases in which it is also proper that an extension of time should be given and that when taken out of time it should be received. After arguing the question fully they expressly say:

> The committee might, indeed, in a case where testimony had been taken out of time, but with full opportunity to the other party to cross-examine the witnesses and exhibit evidence in reply, * * * recommend to the House, if they find sufficient reason therefor, that the evidence be considered as if taken in time.

Such is precisely the case now before the House with this single exception. In the case cited, in speaking of the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses and exhibit evidence in reply, the further qualification is appended that that should have been fully done. In the case under consideration that was not fully done, nor done at all, but it was by reason of the refusal of the contestee. It is now proposed to afford him that opportunity again, with the understanding that the committee will in its final report ask the House to approve its action in regarding the testimony already taken as taken out of time for sufficient cause, and therefore considering it as if taken in time.

I maintain, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the case of O'Hara vs. Kitchin, if authority at all upon this question, is authority in favor of recognizing and giving efficacy to a parol agreement of this kind entered into in good faith. Why, sir, we all know that every State of the Union has statutory provisions prescribing the manner in which depositions shall be taken. The testimony in this case is none other than depositions. What court within the confines of the United States, if those engaged in the trial of a case, whether at common law or in equity or a criminal case, should meet together and enter into a stipulation waiving the provisions of the statute and agreeing to take depositions out of time, would refuse to give effect to such a stipulation? Is there any such tribunal? Should the practice here be more technical? If so, why? It is true that in some States such agreements are required to be in writing, and that unquestionably would be desirable, but we have here no such statutory requirement.

Now, sir, as has been stated by my colleague [Mr. TURNER], the chairman of the Committee on Elections, here is a charge of venality and corruption in connection with the election of a member of Congress. This record bristles all through with evidence addressed to that charge. It is not for me to say now to what extent it establishes it. I trust when the opportunity is afforded, as the committee generously proposes to have afforded to the sitting member in this case, he will be abundantly able to show his hands are clean and his skirts are clear of even the faintest taint of corruption.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. LOWRY. Permit me to proceed. My time is limited, and I have but a few moments myself.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I wish to bring out one or two facts in connection with this, if you will permit me.

Mr. LOWRY. This being their hope, the resolution of the majority of the committee proposes to allow the contestee the opportunity. He having declined to appear in response to notice served on him to cross-examine witnesses, under the possible impression that his parol agreement would not be operative, the committee proposes out of abundance of charity for his motives and liberality of feeling toward a gentleman whom they trust is wrongly accused to afford him an opportunity to resummon and cross-examine these witnesses and to take testimony in his own behalf for a period of thirty days after the adoption of the resolution, and also to give to the contestant ten days for the purpose of taking rebutting testimony.

On the other hand, the minority of the committee propose by the resolution they submit to recommit this case to the Committee on Elections, directing them to appoint a subcommittee for the purpose of going into the State of Rhode Island at an expense of not to exceed $2,000, to employ reporters, and, it is fair to assume, I think, take all the testimony anew. It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, the proper course for the sitting member to pursue is to court investigation of this question here, to seek opportunity to cross-examine these witnesses, and to introduce such exculpatory testimony as it is in his power to introduce. We have no occasion to depart from the usual course in this instance. There is no need of any roving commission in the form of a subcommittee. Let the testimony be taken in the usual way, and be brought here and impartially weighed.

Now, sir, the State of Rhode Island has gone far enough. She has a fungous growth in her constitution which prohibits too many of her citizens the right of suffrage. She occupies the unenviable position of having a clause in her constitution by which all those who do not happen to be born on this side of the Atlantic Ocean are required to own $134 worth of real estate in order to entitle them to the exercise of the right of suffrage. Under that clause of her constitution, it is a matter of tradition, if not of history, that a former member of this House who himself had possessed all the qualifications necessary for the exercise of the right of suffrage, all the attributes necessary in order to be elected as a member of this House, in the vicissitudes of life met with reverses, was stripped of his property, and when he went back to his home in Rhode Island and went up to the polls to vote, by reason of the fact that he was no longer the owner of senseless clods and insensate brick and mortar, he was deprived of the privilege of voting for even a town constable. We have no power to correct or control that, sir; we can not prune the foliage of that tree—outgrowth as it is of bigotry and intolerance—but we can prevent those who deny the right of suffrage to the entire people of Rhode Island from cultivating that poisonous and deadly upas which results from dishonest use of money and from venality and corruption in the conduct of their elections. [Great applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN] has twenty-two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I will yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, the only question which presented itself to the committee was, whether the misunderstanding between the contestant and the contestee in reference to the time in which they should take their testimony should operate to cut off inquiry on behalf of the House or its committee in reference to evils which were manifest from the most casual examination of the record presented in that case.

The question has been asked by the gentleman from Rhode Island whether the contestee has done anything wrong, or whether he has omitted to do anything which it was his duty to do in reference to this contest. That suggestion involves the idea that in this House the contest is merely a matter personal to two men who happen to be striving for a seat. That, in my judgment, is a position which can not obtain for one moment.

There are questions involved here beyond their personal rights or their personal claims, and there can be no question that a contest once properly instituted with reference to the validity and legality of an election not only does not terminate with, but does not depend upon, the conduct of the contestant or the contestee. This House holds in its own hands the power of determining questions of that kind, let them come before it when or in what manner they may.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when Mr. Page instituted this contest, and the time prescribed by the statute within which the evidence ought to have been taken had elapsed, the contest itself did not cease with it. The Forty-ninth Congress had not yet held its first session; it had not come into existence. It is here to-day, and is here to decide the question under the constitutional provision which gives it power and authority to determine the question of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and under the constitutional provision it is not limited to the proceedings of the committee nor to the evidence which the parties to the contest may have introduced. It seems to me that the gentlemen who have discussed this legal question on the other side of the House have failed to confront the true relation between the contest and the House itself. The statutes which have been enacted directing the time within which the testimony shall be taken are but directory. They are enacted for the purpose of giving the contestant and the contestee the power to summon witnesses and bring them before the officers to take their depositions.

They are not necessary to the House, but simply to the parties to the contest themselves. Without these statutes the witnesses would have the power to refuse to appear; they would have the power to refuse to testify absolutely; and hence these statutes were enacted simply to put into the hands of the parties to the contest the power to secure the testimony which would be necessary to substantiate or rebut the claim. Each of them is allowed a specified time for this purpose; but after they have accomplished all of the purposes the statute had in view, and have taken the testimony, the case comes here, not solely upon that testimony, but upon all and every consideration that may present itself to this body.

This House to-day has the power to take this record, prepared as it was, and act upon it without reference to other testimony or to other consideration; and that was the view entertained by the committee with reference to every contest pending in the House which had been referred to the committee. The evidence, although showing very remarkable circumstances, had been taken under a mutual misapprehension between the parties; but out of generosity to the contestee, and for the purpose of enabling the most full, perfect, and complete investigation of which the case is susceptible, the committee determined to bring the question back to the House and ask an order of the House authorizing, by its own direction, further time to be given to pursue the investigation. That is the origin and explanation of the resolution.

The resolution suggested by the minority of the committee as a substitute is not one directed to the contest to ascertain as to whether there was a legal election and determine whether the present sitting member is entitled to a seat, but is in the direction of an investigation which could result alone in expulsion, and which, in my judgment, is an improper procedure at this stage of the case.

In my judgment, the House owes it to itself and to the elections which are authorized under the statutes to say that this contest shall be pursued properly and legitimately, and the House through that means and instrumentality be advised of what are the rights of the parties concerned, as well as the rights of the House itself.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I labor under the impression that everything that can be said in reference to this matter on both sides has been said; and I therefore demand the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. ELY. Pending that, I move to substitute the resolutions in the minority report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that has been already done. The minority resolutions are reported by the minority of the committee, as the Chair understands, as a substitute, and are offered as such for the resolution of the majority of the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, I hope before the previous question is ordered, or at least that the gentleman from New Jersey will withdraw it long enough to allow me to submit a resolution which I would like to have considered and voted upon at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. But the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask to have it read to be offered as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. A substitute is now pending offered by the minority of the committee.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I ask that it be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it will be read for the information of the House.

Mr. HAMMOND. I object.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I demand the previous question.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 83, noes none.

Mr. SPOONER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 121, noes none.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to state to the House that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER] had a resolution which he desired to submit as a substitute for that proposed by the majority of the committee. I think the House will recognize at once it is a reasonable proposition. If this investigation is to be ordered, I think that proposition will be recognized as reasonable, and I submit to the House it would be wise for us to have it read, and then determine whether it is not a proper resolution.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I believe that is right.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be read.

Mr. HAMMOND. As I have been notified by the other side of the House that they intend to have that resolution read or stay, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that it is evident it is the intention of this House to pass the majority resolution. If that is to be done, it ought to be done in a shape reasonably satisfactory to both sides; and I have no doubt that when the resolution of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER] is read there will be consent to substitute it for the resolution of the minority.

Mr. TURNER. I beg to state that the House has assumed that the sentiment of the minority of the committee is best represented by the resolution which the minority of the committee has proposed.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is perfectly true. At the same time it was believed that the House might take a different view of it. But it has become apparent so far as we have progressed that the majority resolution is likely to prevail in some shape or other; but an opportunity should be given to take the sense of the House on the proposition of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. TURNER. I have a great deal of respect for the wish of the gentleman from Maine, but I respectfully submit it is rather an extraordinary request to make that there should be two substitutes pending to be voted upon.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Georgia hear the substitute which the gentleman from Rhode Island desires to offer?

Mr. TURNER. I have no objection to hearing it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is the other substitute withdrawn?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Yes, sir; if the resolution of the gentleman from Rhode Island can be substituted for it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Maine to say the purpose is to withdraw the substitute offered by the minority of the committee and put in place of it as a substitute for the report of the majority the resolution of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER], and he requests that the resolution of the gentleman from Rhode Island be read.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. I think we ought to understand that that is the purpose.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be read for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That William A. Pirce, sitting member from the second Congressional district of Rhode Island, be allowed forty days from and including the —— day of May next ensuing in which to cross-examine witnesses heretofore examined by Charles H. Page, the contestant, and to take any testimony he may desire; and that ten days next following the expiration of said forty days be allowed to said Page to take evidence in rebuttal: Provided, That said Page shall produce said witnesses heretofore examined by him for such cross-examination before the magistrate or magistrates designated by said Pirce within and during the first ten days of said forty days, and in such hours as said Pirce may theretofore designate; and the testimony heretofore taken of any such witnesses not so produced shall be stricken out of the record and not thereafter be considered testimony in the case.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is an error in the resolution. It speaks of May next. I presume the gentleman means this present May.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir. I ask permission to make a brief statement.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company of Texas to maintain a bridge across the Red River.

CONTESTED ELECTION—PAGE VS. PIRCE.

Mr. SPOONER. If this testimony had been taken in the regular way the contestant, Page, would have produced his witnesses within the first forty days and they would have been present for examination by Pirce, the contestee. Now the resolution proposed by the majority of the committee makes it necessary for Mr. Pirce to start immediately, with his thirty days commencing to run, if the majority resolution is adopted, from the time of its passage. He has to go home, make arrangements for testimony, find witnesses if he can who have been produced by Mr. Page, and go on with his cross-examination and complete it within thirty days. I ask is it a fair proposition? What I wish is to require in some manner that these witnesses, produced by Mr. Page, shall be fairly presented for cross-examination; that a reasonable time, as much as the law would have allowed if the testimony had been taken in the regular course, be given to Mr. Pirce within which to cross-examine these witnesses and take his own testimony. That is all I seek to reach by the resolution. It seems to me it is an entirely fair proposition. If there is anything in the language of the resolution that is not fair and proper, I am entirely willing to submit it to correction.

Mr. TURNER. I ask permission to make a brief statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. TURNER. As I understand, the proposition is to submit the resolution which has just been read in lieu of the substitute already pending. When put in that position it would be a substitute for the resolution of the majority of the committee. Am I correct?

The SPEAKER. That was the statement made by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. SPRINGER. And that a vote be allowed on each.

Mr. TURNER. I desire to say, so far as I am concerned I would like to ascertain whether if we consent this shall be offered as a substitute in that way obstructions shall cease.

Mr. REED, of Maine. There has been no obstruction.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It would seem that under that resolution there can be no determination of the question during this session.

Mr. TURNER again addressed the Chair.

Mr. HAMMOND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] should be allowed to continue his statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] calls for the regular order. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand to allow his colleague to finish his statement?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER. As I understand the disposition of gentlemen on the other side of the House there is no disposition to resort to anything like obstruction, and I acquit the gentleman from Maine, although it might be somewhat hard to a jury sitting on the facts to agree to that verdict.

As I have said, I understand that there is no disposition to offer obstruction in the event the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island as a substitute shall take the place of the substitute now pending. In order to accommodate gentlemen I shall offer no resistance to that; but as the gentleman from Rhode Island has made a remark in regard to the difficulties and the injustice which would arise under the resolution reported by the majority of the committee, I may be permitted to add that if this resolution had passed when it was first proposed by the committee there would have been some reason in the request for further time than that allowed by the resolution; but there has been delay in the consideration of this case, delay granted by the gentleman who made the report in deference to the wishes of the sitting member, who has been absent from the House, perhaps on important business, or with some other lawful excuse; and now, if the time is extended, as proposed in this substitute, I fear the result will be that the evidence will come back here too late to be acted on at this session. That is the reason I could not assent to the proposition of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER]. I believe, on the merits of the proposition, that the time allowed in the report of the majority is ample for all purposes. But, as I have already indicated, I am willing, so far as I am concerned, that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island shall take its position in lieu of the substitute now pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER] asks unanimous consent that the substitute proposed by the minority of the Committee on Elections may be withdrawn, and that in lieu of it the resolution offered by him, which has just been read, shall take its place as a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority of the committee and be voted on instead of the other.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, my only desire is to arrive at a reasonable and fair result, and therefore I am willing to strike out from the resolution all after and including the word "provided."

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be reported as it is proposed it shall stand.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William A. Pirce, sitting member from the second Congressional district of Rhode Island, be allowed forty days, from and including the 12th day of May next ensuing, within which to cross-examine witnesses heretofore examined by Charles H. Page, the contestant; and that ten days next after the expiration of said forty days be allowed to said Page to take evidence in rebuttal.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Evidently there is a mistake there. The "12th day of May next" will be next year.

Mr. SPOONER. The 12th day of May, 1886, is what I mean. I will modify that part of the resolution so as to read "the 12th day of May instant."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN] demands the previous question on the adoption of the report of the committee.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER] for the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 87, noes 103.

Mr. REED, of Maine, and Mr. SPOONER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The House again divided; and there—yeas 99, nays 127, not voting 96; as follows:

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

The SPEAKER (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). In accordance with the order heretofore made, the House now takes a recess until this evening at half past 7 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past 7 o'clock p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, the session of this evening is to be devoted to the consideration of bills heretofore reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROMOTION OF WEST POINT GRADUATES.

Mr. BRAGG. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 223) to regulate the promotion of graduates of the United States Military Academy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That when any cadet of the United States Military Academy has gone through all its classes and received a regular diploma from the academic staff, he may be promoted and commissioned as a second lieutenant in any arm or corps of the Army in which there may be a vacancy, and the duties of which he may have been judged competent to perform; and in case there shall not at the time be a vacancy in such arm or corps, he may, at the discretion of the President, be promoted and commissioned in it as an additional second lieutenant, with the usual pay and allowances of a second lieutenant until a vacancy shall happen.

Mr. BRAGG. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is generally understood by every member of the House, and I have not received from any source any intimation of objection to it. I therefore ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL-SERVICE CLERKS.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of "general-service clerks" and "general-service messengers" in the Army, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with sundry amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States, for clerical service and messenger duty at the headquarters of the Army and at the several division, department, and district headquarters in the Army a corps of men not to exceed one hundred and forty-five, who shall be subject to the Articles of War and Army Regulations the same as enlisted men on duty in the line, but shall not be subject to be assigned to any other than clerical and messenger duty, as hereinbefore specified; nor shall this number be computed as a part of the number at which the Army is now limited by law.

SEC. 2. That the men to be so enlisted and mustered as hereinbefore provided shall be classified as follows, namely: One hundred shall be for "general-service clerks," and forty-five shall be for "general-service messengers;" and the two classes shall be paid as follows: "General-service clerks" shall receive at the rate of $1,000 per annum, and "general-service messengers" shall receive at the rate of $60 per month; and both classes shall be mustered for pay bimonthly the same as enlisted men, and shall receive no other compensation, pay, or allowance, except when on duty, when necessity requires, they shall each be allowed for subsistence one ration in kind, to be issued by the Commissary Department.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "forty-five" and insert "forty-eight."

Strike out all after section 2 down to and including the words "both classes," in the eighth line of second section, and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"That of the men so enlisted one hundred and three shall be 'general-service clerks,' who shall be classified and paid as follows: Class 1 shall consist of sixty-six clerks, at $1,000 per annum; class 2 shall consist of twenty-five clerks, at $1,100 per annum; class 1 shall consist of ten clerks, at $1,200 per annum; and the remaining forty-five of such men shall be 'general-service messengers,' who shall be paid at the rate of $60 per month; and all of such men."

Add to the bill as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the provisions of law relating to the retirement of enlisted men shall be construed to include 'general-service clerks' and 'general-service messengers.'"

Mr. RANDALL. Let the report of the committee be read.

The report of the committee (by Mr. BRAGG) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of general-service clerks and general-service messengers in the Army, submit the following report:

The committee have carefully considered this bill and believe its adoption, with the amendments hereinafter proposed, will correct an abuse which has grown up in the Army, perhaps measurably as a necessity, and which has been overlooked or winked at in making appropriations for the Army.

Under the present régime there are employed as general-service clerks one hundred and sixty-seven men who are borne as soldiers on the Army rolls, making part of the aggregate of twenty-five thousand men, as your committee are advised by a communication received from the headquarters of the Army, and there are six more authorized under general orders; and in addition to this number there is the same authority for the employment of sixty-four more men as general-service messengers, most if not all of whom are on duty.

There is no statute law prescribing the pay of clerks or messengers, but they have been enlisted as soldiers—privates, at $13 per month. This pay has been increased a few dollars per month by rating some of the clerks as sergeants, at $17 per month, and corporals at $15 per month. Then there have been added to clerks extra-duty pay at 50 cents per day; and commutation for fuel at $9 per month in some instances, and commutation for quarters at $21 per month, and in some instances commutation for rations at $1 per day and in other instances at 75 cents per day. So that the aggregate of a clerk's pay is swelled by contribution levied on the quartermaster, commissary, and paymaster to a monthly aggregate, over and above food and clothing, of $80.50 per month, as is stated in their memorial, and the same pay is stated by a communication from headquarters to range from $91.60 to $104.81 per month, depending upon grade and length of service.

It is not surprising that this difference in statement should exist, for the ways devised for getting this pay are so devious that it is quite difficult for any two minds not acting in immediate concert to arrive at the same result in ascertaining the value of the seemingly unknown quantity.

The messsenger has his pay increased by adding thereto 35 cents per day for extra-duty pay, $8 per month for fuel, and $10 per month for commutation of quarters, and 75 cents per day for rations extra, making an aggregate of about $114.75 per annum less to messengers than clerks.

The committee state that after careful examination they find no law for the commutation for rations, fuel, or quarters at any such rates as have been given either clerks or messengers, neither have they been cited to any, except inferential deductions from the omission of Congress to forbid.

The whole system has crept in under countenance of general orders and without the support of law; and believing as they do that it is unwise to admit the plea of military convenience in time of peace, touching the expenditure of public money, without the sanction of law, and fraught with danger to our system of government, where the military should always in time of peace be held subordinate to the civil power, this committee have refused to make appropriations that could be tapped to meet necessities occasioned by what seemed to them to be quasi "military orders" encroaching upon the functions of the civil arm of the Government.

Commutation for fuel to officers was prohibited by Congress (see Revised Statutes, section 1270), and where public quarters can not be furnished, the limit of commutation per room is fixed at $12 per month (see Revised Statutes, section 1270, as amended chapter 79, laws of 1881); while here under general orders we find, in direct violation of the spirit of the law, a clerk is allowed $21 per month. The plea of "large families" has been frequently put forth while this measure has been under consideration. It may be cruel and hard-hearted to say it, but it should always be remembered that in recruiting for armies families are never enlisted, and if pay is to be graded on the basis of families, one soldier may receive his $13 per month and his fellow, not nearly so deserving, may receive $130.

The purpose of this bill is to create a corps of clerks and messengers, and to fix for them specific pay by law.

The first question for consideration in the detail of the bill is, What shall be a sufficient number of clerks and messengers to properly do the work required? The present distribution of clerks is as follows: Army headquarters, 9 clerks and 3 messengers—12; Division of the Atlantic and Department of the East, clerks, 15; Division of the Pacific and Department of California, 17; Division of the Missouri, 17; Department of Texas, 14; Department of the Missouri, 15; Department of the Platte, 13; Department of Dakota, 15; Department of the Columbia, 14; Department of Arizona, 14; superintendent general recruiting service, 6; superintendent general mounted service, 4; District of New Mexico, 6; District of Montana, 1; Military Academy, 4.

It is readily manifest to any mind educated to what work is and how it should be done, and at all familiar with the work necessary to be done at these several headquarters, that there must be many idle hours for this clerical force, and perhaps it may not be amiss to suggest that it is time to disabuse the public mind of the idea which has become so prevalent that a staff officer is an ornament merely, by so reducing the clerical force at the different headquarters as to leave some portion of the clerical work to fall within the province of the staff, and which they may well do to prevent ennui, and without detraction from their dignity. The several division headquarters only deal directly with Army headquarters above them and departmental headquarters below them, and it seems asking too much of our credulity to believe that it requires at any headquarters the time of a large staff and seventeen clerks to do the necessary duty, under even a six-hour day law.

Your committee conclude and believe the force unnecessarily large. Upon consultation with the Lieutenant-General commanding, he recommended the retention of 125; and the Adjutant-General, who should be best acquainted with the actual necessities of the service in that department fixed the number at 103, which the committee adopted.

The number of messengers is fixed at 45, that being the number which it was thought by the Lieutenant-General might be sufficient. The committee are inclined to believe that 4 messengers to each of the ten headquarters and 5 for general use are not only all that are necessary, but it is quite questionable whether the number is not in excess of the legitimate requirements of the service.

In the clasification of clerks, the committee have provided for 10 chief clerks, one for Army, division, and each department headquarters, at $1,200; 25 clerks, one for Army, and each division and department headquarters, and each district headquarters, and recruiting service, and at West Point, at $1,100 per annum, and the remainder at $1,000 per annum, to be distributed as the needs of the service might require; and the pay of the messenger force the committee think is sufficiently high for the service performed at $60 per month. The reduction in expense, if this bill becomes a law, will not be less than $90,000 per annum.

The pay of the clerks as fixed by the bill, as amended, averages very nearly the pay now eked out by indirection, and in some respects the amount proposed to be paid may be said to be in excess of what is now received, because there is no retained pay—no contingency upon length of service and the like.

The pay is believed to be fully all the labor is worth, which is purely mechanical work, and when it is considered that the benefits of the retired-list is extended to these clerks and messengers, which is not extended to the civilian clerks in the other Departments, it is believed that no inequality can be found upon which to base a well-grounded complaint.

The only remaining feature of the bill is the exclusion from the computation of the Army, in making its aggregate, of the non-combatant force provided for in this bill.

It seems to the committee that this provision will meet general approval, for while it is conceded that the present limit of the Army is not too small, perhaps, it must also be the wish of us all that such force should not be upon paper and on the pay-rolls only, but should be ready to take the field. Clerks and non-combatants should not be counted as soldiers, and this bill makes that distinction.

The committee recommend the following amendments to make the bill correspond with this report, to wit:

First amendment.—In line 8 of first section strike out the words "forty-five" and insert the words "forty-eight."

Second amendment.—Strike out all after "Sec. 2" down to and including the words "both classes," in the eighth line of second section, and insert in lieu thereof as follows: "That of the men so enlisted one hundred and three shall be 'general-service clerks,' who shall be classified and paid as follows: Class 1 shall consist of sixty-six clerks, at $1,000 per annum; class 2 shall consist of twenty-five clerks, at $1,100 per annum; class 3 shall consist of ten clerks, at $1,200 per annum; and the remaining forty-five of such men shall be 'general-service messengers,' who shall be paid at the rate of $60 per month, and all of such men."

Third amendment.—Add a section to the bill, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the provisions of the law relating to the retirement of enlisted men shall be construed to include 'general-service clerks' and 'general-service messengers.'"

And when so amended recommend the bill do pass.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, the first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs is to strike out "forty-five" and insert "forty-eight" in the first section. The second amendment is to strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof "the classification and duties of these general-service clerks, as well as their salaries."

The purpose of this bill is to fix and limit the duties and status of "general-service clerks" and "general-service messengers" in the Army. Heretofore they have been enlisted as private soldiers. The number authorized for general-service clerks was one hundred and seventy-three, and the number authorized for general-service messengers was sixty-six. Some of the clerks were made sergeants, so they received $16 to $18 more. Some were made corporals, receiving $2 more than private soldiers.

Then under general orders, outside of any positive statutes, they have been receiving extra rations to the amount of 75 cents or $1 a day. They have been allowed extra-duty pay at the rate of 50 cents a day. They have been allowed commutation for quarters at $21 a month, and commutation for fuel at $9 a month. So the amount of their salaries in the aggregate, arranged from their estimate, furnished, I have no doubt, to every member of the House in their circulars, ranged from $80 to $90, or as estimated by the headquarters of the Army at from $90 to $104.

When the Committee on Military Affairs commenced to prepare their Army appropriation bill, and having in view the restriction upon them by the rules they should make no appropriation except what was provided by existing laws, they found these clerks were provided for under general orders, and that the commutation for fuel and rations came out of the appropriations for the Commissary Department, and the extra-duty pay of 50 cents came out of the general-service fund providing that clerks and mechanics should receive that amount.

Upon general examination we found there are ten headquarters, and we found as high as seventeen at some. We came to the conclusion there was no headquarters of any department or any division which required any such clerical force for the work they had to do, even at eight hours a day, and we determined there should be a reduction of that force and that it should be limited by law, so there would be no more military arrangements by which support for these general-service clerks could be eked out by taking it from the appropriation for the support of the Army. We submitted the question to the general-in-chief, and after considerable discussion we came to the conclusion he could get along with one hundred and forty-five instead of one hundred and seventy-three general-service clerks, and with forty-five messengers instead of sixty-six. We submitted the question to the Adjutant-General of the Army, who has control and management of headquarters, and he recognized, so long as the present system was maintained, it would be necessary to employ one hundred and three clerks. Therefore we reported our bill for one hundred and three clerks, being seventy less than are now in the employ of the Government, and for forty-five messengers, being nineteen less than are now in the employ of the Government.

Then came up the question as to their pay. We came to the conclusion upon the investigation of that question that we rated their pay very similar to what the pay is now, as made up by piecemeal out of the several funds from which they have been provided. We classified them so as to provide one general clerk for each Army headquarters, which would be ten clerks.

We then provided for twenty-five clerks of the next class, which would furnish one of the second-class clerks for each of the Army headquarters, for each of the districts headquarters, the districts of Montana, New Mexico, and West Point, and for each of the several general recruiting stations. That left us sixty-six remaining to be disposed of, which we left for distribution as it might be directed by the Adjutant-General or the Lieutenant-General commanding the Army and as the exigencies of the service might require—for the different headquarters one or more clerks. So we graded them in three classes corresponding in a degree to the classes as they existed before, sergeants, corporals, and privates, and graded them by their salaries instead of by any factitious rank, for they were sergeants of nothing and corporals of nothing when they were doing duty simply upon the staff.

This reduction in the number of clerks and messengers which we have made will not impair the service, but will give them a fixed, certain status, so that they know where they belong, they know what money they are to receive, and they are paid by the paymaster by draft on the different funds in the Commissary or Quartermaster's Department.

This arrangement, Mr. Speaker, will save the Government a little over $90,000 a year, as any one can see by making the computation. So we deemed it not only a wise measure but an economical measure, and for that reason I was directed to report this bill to the House to-night and ask the House to pass it.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. I have very little doubt from the statement of the gentleman that this is a great improvement, because it appears directly upon the face of the law and declares what we shall have exactly in the way of clerical force connected with the Army.

I want to ask, however, what becomes of the seventy clerks and the fourteen or nineteen messengers dispensed with?

Mr. BRAGG. They simply resume their places, being all enlisted men in the Army.

Mr. RANDALL. They count them as a part of the twenty-five thousand?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the new clerks at the fixed salary and the new messengers at a fixed salary, will they count also as a part of the twenty-five thousand?

Mr. BRAGG. No, because they are simply employed for the discharge of a clerical duty.

Mr. RANDALL. Then it increases the Army to that extent?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; but it increases the effective force of the Army without any additional numbers.

Mr. BRADY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRADY. Does not this proposed legislation create new offices?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir.

Mr. BRADY. I understand that it does. It creates civilian employés, as I understand it.

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; they are not exactly civilian employés. They are enlisted for this duty.

Mr. BRADY. Are they regularly enlisted and subject to the rules and regulations of war?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir; subject to the rules and regulations of war, but they are not counted as a part of the twenty-five thousand. They are a part of the non-combatant force of the Army.

Mr. BRADY. Then I understand that the effect of the proposed legislation will be a reduction of expenditures some $90,000?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to read the bill, and only gathered its provisions from the reading at the desk. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if I was correct in inferring that it provides for retiring these clerks.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir; they are entitled to be retired as other enlisted men.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the object of that, if they are non-combatants?

Mr. BRAGG. The object is this: Some of these men, most of them, have been in the service for a long time. Some have been in the service for nearly thirty years discharging their duties. They have served their whole lives as clerks, and are proficient in the routine work of the department to which they are assigned. Under the present law they are entitled to the benefit of the retirement clause after service for a certain time in the Army, and when we made the grade for the salary of the clerks under this provision you will notice that it is $400 less per annum than the grade that the same class of clerks in the Commissary or Quartermaster's Departments, and performing the same duties, are receiving. Now, it seemed to the committee that the provision which they had before, providing for their retirement and which they would have now after a service of thirty years, should remain and that they should receive the benefit of the retirement clause, which is a fixed benefit to them, instead of paying them $1,600 or $1,800 as the clerks are paid in the Departments.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then it does not increase the retired-list?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Nor create any new retired-list?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It simply treats them as the other enlisted men are treated.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. The number you have finally agreed upon is the number which the Adjutant-General of the Army said was sufficient?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. But twenty-two less than the Lieutenent-General commanding——

Mr. BRAGG. Wanted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Thought could be got along with, and the pay you give is very much less than similar clerks get in the Departments here?

Mr. BRAGG. In the civilian department. The difference is, they are provided for on the retired-list after thirty years' service.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. They get no commutation, or quarters, or rations?

Mr. BRAGG. They get rations under certain circumstances.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What are the circumstances?

Mr. BRAGG. If you will read the section of the bill you will see those circumstances stated. It is where they are stationed at posts where they can not conveniently provide for themselves.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I could not get a copy of the bill, and it is for that reason I ask these questions. They do not get rations when they are stationed, for instance, at Washington or Governor's Island?

Mr. BRAGG. I think not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Then they provide their own rations?

Mr. BRAGG. That is the intention.

Mr. RANDALL. How do you fill vacancies?

Mr. BRAGG. By enlistment.

Mr. RANDALL. Enlistment for the particular service?

Mr. BRAGG. For that service.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Will these clerks be taken from the service?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir; they will be simply mustered out, and mustered in for this service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). If there be no demand for a division of the amendments, the Chair will put the question on agreeing to the amendments as a whole submitted by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question being taken on the amendments, they were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SCHOOL OF INSTRUCTION FOR CAVALRY, ETC.

Mr. BRAGG. I now call up the bill (H. R. 7192) to provide a school of instruction for cavalry and light artillery, and for the construction and completion of quarters, barracks, and stables at certain posts for the use of the Army of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the bill, and that the same be considered in the House.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish upon the military reservation at Fort Riley a permanent school of instruction for drill and practice for the cavalry and light artillery service of the Army of the United States, and which shall be the depot to which all recruits for such service shall be sent; and for the purpose of construction of such quarters, barracks, and stables as may be required to carry into effect the purposes of this act the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to complete the quarters and barracks at Fort D. A. Russell, in the Territory of Wyoming, and also to enlarge and complete the quarters and barracks at Fort Robinson, in the State of Nebraska, to a capacity for a garrison of ten companies; and there is hereby appropriated for the purposes mentioned in this section, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BRAGG. This bill requires some little explanation, that the members of the House may see upon what basis the committee have acted. The bill upon its face purports to call for an expenditure, and does call for an expenditure of $375,000 for the construction of barracks at Fort Robinson and the completion of barracks already in progress of construction at Fort Russell, being two points selected by the Lieutenant-General as being valuable both as strategic points and because Fort Robinson, particularly, is immediately in the neighborhood of the large reservation of the Cheyenne Indians—the Indians of the Sitting Bull tribe, numbering eighteen thousand—in Nebraska.

Each of these points has railroad facilities, so that by enlarging the posts and drawing in the men from the small posts the cost and expense of the maintenance of the soldier is very largely reduced and the facilities by which the soldiers can be taken in bodies and distributed at any point along the line of the frontier where their services may be necessary are greatly increased, it being a step in the direction of what we have all been talking of doing for years but have rarely attempted to do for fear it will cost too much money; and the system, of which we make this one of the initiatory steps, being to withdraw the troops from the little two and four company posts where they have ceased to be soldiers, but have become hostlers and gardeners, detailed men running after quartermasters' trains and doing every duty except the duty properly belonging to a soldier and to the profession of arms, not taking pride in themselves as soldiers and the command to which they belong, that it shall be equal to any and not inferior to any other command in the Army.

You will readily see when troops are brought together you then have an opportunity for drilling your troops that furnishes something for the men to do which makes them soldiers and keeps them out of habits of idleness and from dropping into worthlessness. It gives something to the officer to do. It keeps him out of many of the vices of which idleness is the parent. A small post requires the same class of detail as a large one. By distributing our little Army into a great multiplicity of posts we have simply destroyed its efficiency and its usefulness. It has become absorbed in details. The officers have nothing to do, and the men have little if anything to do connected with the profession of a soldier, and that is very much the reason why so many and so great complaints have been made with reference to the desertions from our Army.

As will be seen by the tables which are attached to this report, which have been carefully computed, the difference between the maintenance of five hundred men and the maintenance of a regiment where transportation can be had by rail is so large as to be almost incredible. The great expense of our Army has always been its transportation. We have more than two millions expended year after year in transportation for the Army. The troops have to be supplied, no matter where they may be. Trains have to be sent to supply them at very great expense, and the item of transportation is very much greater than the item of the mere support of the Army.

Another point: These men when brought together will get up the feeling, not only of pride, but of rivalry, a feeling which goes to make the soldier. Again, by concentrating them into large posts and establishing those posts permanently we have an opportunity for doing what we have often talked about doing and what has been always spoken of as a good thing to do—providing post libraries. They never can be provided while we have these numerous little posts that have no permanency, are liable to be removed at any time, but by drawing the men together into these permanent posts you can establish libraries, and a very small contribution of books each year will furnish material which will occupy the attention of the soldier and help him to make of himself a man as well as a soldier.

In another point of view this change will be advantageous. Each one of these little insignificant posts scattered through the Northwest and along the frontier requires a surgeon, each surgeon requires a hospital steward, and the hospital steward and the surgeon require a hospital; so that you are called upon continually both to pay the surgeon and to pay for the construction and maintenance of hospitals, which are continually being abandoned one after another and are scarcely fit to put a patient in before they are abandoned.

This proposed change will result in all these advantages, not only to the Army but to the country at large.

Then comes the question of economy, in another point of view. I should dislike very much to have it said by any member of this House that the Military Committee is an extravagant committee. We recommend, it is true, an appropriation of $175,000. The last Military Committee recommended for a single post at Atlanta an appropriation of $165,000, which was not included in the Army bill. Our present Army bill is more than $500,000 less than the last Army bill, and in making that reduction we have discounted the clerical service (which we have already acted upon here), and we have discounted largely, also, the reduction in transportation made by the consolidation of the forces. So that we have really $500,000 of capital on our hands to deal with for the benefit of the Army, money taken out of the funds heretofore appropriated for the Army.

When the committee determined upon this line of policy the commanding general said, "I don't think you will ever get the House to allow that money." I said, "I have no doubt at all that the House will allow the money." He said, "I do not believe it." I said, "They will, because we are going to take it out of you." He said, "How are you going to take it out of us?" I said, "We are going to reduce your transportation and cut down the extraneous expenses of the Army, and thus create a fund out of which we shall be able to do what you have so long been asking us to do, consolidate the regiments, and also establish a camp where the men who are sent out as cavalrymen to pursue Indians shall learn at least how to ride on horseback before they are sent out to chase Apaches into Mexico."

So much with regard to these two points. This bill carries with it an appropriation of $200,000 in addition to the $175,000 (making the $375,000), for the establishment of a permanent school for the instruction of our light batteries, as well as for the instruction of cavalry recruits and cavalrymen in their duties before they are assigned to their regiments. The place designated is Fort Riley, in the State of Kansas. The reason of its designation is set forth by the Lieutenant-General in his letter attached to the report of the committee. It is one of the cheapest posts, if not quite the cheapest, on the frontier for the maintenance of troops and for the sustaining of such an establishment as we propose. It has plenty of wood and plenty of water; it is in a good climate; it has fine grass; it has good railroad facilities for the distribution of troops. We own there something over 20,000 acres of land.

That land affords ample range for practice with all the batteries we have, with any range gun that we may see fit to use, and also for cavalry and light batteries. There our recruits can be drilled; there the horses can be drilled, and the recruit, when he leaves his camp, will have learned to be a soldier, instead of going to his regiment either to be thrown off his horse on the first raid or to be lugged in an ambulance immediately after by reason of his being unfit to discharge his duties. Those evils will be all done away, and our men will be thoroughly drilled and equipped for duty. It will furnish, in addition, a place for the disposition of our many officers who are unfitted for field-service, and who have no opportunity to go upon the retired-list, for the reason that the retired-list, under the limitation fixed by law, is full. These officers are entirely competent to discharge the duty which will be assigned them of drilling these men and fitting them for service.

Mr. LONG. How many men, out of the twenty-five thousand in the Army, do you propose to concentrate in this camp?

Mr. BRAGG. We propose simply to concentrate the recruits as they are passed to this cavalry depot for drill and distribution.

Mr. LONG. How long will they remain there?

Mr. BRAGG. Until they are fitted to go to their commands.

Mr. LONG. That will be about what length of time?

Mr. BRAGG. Well, sir, I should perhaps differ from almost anybody else on that subject; for I do not think a cavalry recruit is fit to start out on horseback in six months.

Mr. LONG. Your intention is that all recruits shall pass through this school?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir; that all cavalry recruits shall pass through this camp.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does not the gentleman think that the best school in which a young soldier can learn his duties is along with old soldiers?

Mr. BRAGG. I think the best school for the young soldier is with old soldiers, provided you keep these in a camp where they are being daily drilled as soldiers and kept under soldierly discipline; but if they are traveling by detachments, with axes and shovels on their backs, far away from their camp, never doing any military duty at all, not even going through the form of a parade—in such a school as that, instead of educating a man to be a soldier, you educate him to be something else than a soldier.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. If it had taken six months for our cavalrymen to be fitted for their duties in the late war we would not have had much of a cavalry army.

Mr. BRAGG. Well, sir, I am very happy to have this opportunity to say to the gentleman that I do not think we had for the first year of the war any cavalry worthy the name. I have seen regiments riding down Pennsylvania avenue in which the men, with both feet pushed into the stirrups, with one hand hanging on to their bridles and with the other grasping the horse's mane, were barely able to keep on their horses, to say nothing of using the carbine.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I think that is an extreme picture.

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir, it is not an extreme picture. Then let me say to the gentleman further that the horses as well as the men require drill. The horses must be accustomed to have men sitting upon them handling the saber and firing the carbine or they will when in action become unmanageable and worthless for cavalry purposes. But what ought to be of all things the pride of our service is our light batteries. When we closed the war we had as fine a light battery service as there was in the world. But now we have scarcely a battery that has fired a shot; I do not know that we have one light battery that has fired a shot from that time till now. Here are improvements going on all the time—improvements in guns, in shot, and everything of that sort. Our men are drilling as infantrymen at their different barracks upon the Atlantic coast.

Mr. STEELE. Let me remind my colleague on the committee that we have already provided a school for artillery at Fortress Monroe.

Mr. LAIRD. That is for heavy artillery.

Mr. BRAGG. The school at Fortress Monroe for artillery is a school for officers. And they do not practice with light batteries there. There is no school anywhere for practice and drill of enlisted men and non-commissioned officers who constitute the battery.

Mr. BRADY. I think the gentleman is mistaken on that point. I have seen artillery batteries drill at Old Point.

Mr. BRAGG. Have you ever seen them fire solid shot?

Mr. BRADY. No, sir.

Mr. BRAGG. Have you ever seen them, with their horses attached and caissons following, wheel into battery?

Mr. BRADY. Yes, sir; frequently.

Mr. BRAGG. And firing?

Mr. BRADY. No, sir; not firing. But I have seen them with their horses frequently.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir; and I have seen them here on the streets in that way.

Mr. BRADY. I have seen them going through the drill.

Mr. STEELE. There is no doubt about that; I have seen them drill there myself.

Mr. BRAGG. Taking this whole appropriation we propose to expend only about $215,000 to complete what the General of the Army says is an actual necessity and what he has for years been trying to bring about. We still have left to the credit of our committee a balance of about $300,000 saving on the appropriation for the support of the Army.

Mr. RANDALL. Not on the law of last year, but on the bill as reported.

Mr. BRAGG. No, on the law.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the figures will not sustain the gentleman.

Mr. BRAGG. In further answer to the question put by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] a while ago, I will say that the question when the recruit shall be deemed fit to go to his command will be determined entirely by the officer who is charged with qualifying him for duty.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I know very little in regard to the merits of this bill as a military measure, nor do I propose to discuss it in that light; but as an inducement for us to pass an appropriation of $275,000 or $375,000, it is urged persistently that we have the money already saved from provisions in the Army appropriation bill. Now, so far as I am acquainted with the legislation of this House we have not yet passed the Army appropriation bill, and therefore we have not yet saved a dollar from the appropriations for that purpose. It does not appear to me as an absolute certainty that there will be any saving by the passage of the bill, because the changes which have been suggested in the Army appropriation bill by the Military Committee may not meet the approbation of the House. If they should not be approved by the House, then instead of there being a saving of $542,000 we shall have made an appropriation out of the general fund for the purposes of this bill. Those purposes may be good; but I want gentlemen to understand that there is as yet no fund saved by the passage of any measure at the present Congress in relation to military affairs. There has not been a dollar saved from which the money proposed to be appropriated by this bill can be taken.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs is $500,000 less than the amount appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations last year. I have the figures here and can give them if necessary.

Mr. PRICE. Five hundred and forty-two thousand four hundred and forty-five dollars.

Mr. RANDALL. That bill went to the Senate. On information received it reduced it $280,000. So the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct if he places his bill as against the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, but not against the bill as it became law. I have the exact figure here. It is $121,464.04. There will be, as the gentleman has informed me, a deficiency in the Army of some $200,000.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to call the attention of the committee (I did not care to speak of it). A deficiency will arise upon the appropriation bill of last year, and it arises in this way: The reduction made in the Senate on the Army was a general razee. Perhaps my friend from Illinois will permit me to use the expression, it was a horizontal cut. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. And such a cut always leaves a sore place. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BRAGG. They cut the pay of the Army, and the pay of the men of the Army, as much as the other branches of the service, and therefore the deficiency arose in the pay of the Army, the precise amount of which I do not know.

Mr. RANDALL. And you have not cut the pay of the Army?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; I have not. I report for the pay of the Army $281,000 more than was appropriated last year by the House. They razeed down what was a mathematical certainty. They reduced the pay as well as other things. In making appropriations we have allowed the pay, because it is subject to mathematical computation what that will come to. But the reduction we took off from the administrative part of the Army, which is expansive, and can expend all you will give them and can get along with less than we give them.

Mr. CLARDY. The construction placed on this bill by some persons whose attention has been directed to it is that it will work an abandonment of recruiting posts throughout the country.

Mr. BRAGG. Not at all.

Mr. CLARDY. I will say what the gentleman from Wisconsin knows, that that is the construction placed upon it by some persons who have given consideration to it.

Mr. BRAGG. There seems to be an apprehension in some parts of the West it is the intention to abandon the present recruiting stations in the West and make Fort Riley a recruiting station. There is nothing of that kind intended, and we have provided for general recruiting stations as before.

Mr. CLARDY. Let me ask the gentleman one question. Take a station like Jefferson Barracks—and I mention that because I know about it—they have as much as 1,500 acres of ground where they have all the quarters necessary for soldiers, stables, &c. Now it would be cheaper to quarter our soldiers there and enable them to learn cavalry drill, &c.

Mr. BRAGG. If you will let us drill our light batteries there, and your people will not complain if a shell strikes in their neighborhood, very well.

Mr. CLARDY. You are not obliged to shoot shells.

Mr. BRAGG. Of course we can shoot off popguns; but we must drill our batteries in such a way as to make them efficient in war when necessary.

Mr. MORRISON. Is it the purpose to maintain the present recruiting stations?

Mr. BRAGG. All the recruiting stations we have are to be maintained. We have a recruiting station at David's Island; we have a recruiting station at Columbus; we have a recruiting station at Saint Louis, and we have other recruiting stations. We have two general recruiting stations, one at David's Island and another at Saint Louis, and we have other minor recruiting stations.

You must remember, my friend from Illinois, that when these recruits are gathered together to go to the Army they are generally selected in large towns, and it is there where the recruiting stations are established. There are barracks to hold them there, and why? Because it would be manifestly a great extravagance to detach an officer with one or two or three or half-dozen recruits from David's Island, New York, to report with such a small detachment to Fort Snelling, or to Omaha, or to San Antonio. Recruits are therefore maintained in the local recruiting stations until there is a squad of men recruited of a sufficient size to warrant their shipment for distribution.

The purpose of this bill is to make the depot of distribution, coming from these several points, the cavalry camp, where they are to be educated and from there distributed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to inquire of my friend from Wisconsin if he is not mistaken in supposing that Fort Robinson is in the vicinity of a large body of Indians.

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. What Indians?

Mr. BRAGG. The Sitting Bull Indians.

Mr. HOLMAN. They belong to the Sioux——

Mr. LAIRD. The Cheyenne and Sioux tribes.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are on the east side of the Sioux reservation. The Cheyennes referred to by the gentleman from Nebraska are a comparatively small body of Indians at Camp Robinson.

Mr. BRAGG. There are sixteen thousand Indians within the reservation in the immediate vicinity of Fort Robinson, Sitting Bull's Indians comprising the larger part of them, and another body of Indians, making the total number I have stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true, but they are principally the Sioux Indians.

Now on the Missouri River there is a continuous line of forts all the way down. There is an important fort on the immediate southern boundary of this reservation. There is Fort Custer on the Crow reservation and another fort, Fort Hall, which is well located. These forts are so situated as to command the entire country. Camp Robinson is not a fort at all, but, as my friend is aware, an old camp. It is not an important point and commands no portion of the Indian reservation. The Sitting Bull body of Indians—the Sioux—are at Standing Rock agency, and there is a fort at that point on the Missouri River right there upon the ground, I do not recall its name at this moment.

There is no portion of the Sioux reservation that is not covered by a fort. Fort Custer is in the very heart of the Crow reservation. Fort Hall covers the Wind River Indians and the Sissetons and other tribes on the Fort Hall reservation. There is not a body of Indians lying between the Missouri River and the western boundary not covered by a fort.

My own impression is the number of forts ought to be diminished. I think the number of military stations between Bismarck and the northern boundary line of Nebraska ought to be diminished at least one-half; in fact, taking the whole country west of the Missouri River you can with perfect security decrease the number of military posts one-half, and thus largely reduce the cost of transportation.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. What will you do with the troops when you reduce the posts as you now propose, unless you make provision by establishing barracks where they may be mustered?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, it may demonstrate at some points the increased capacity of military posts; but it is certainly not policy to increase the number. If my friend from Wisconsin had proposed a large reduction of the military posts and the enlargement of Camp Robinson I would have seen at once the propriety of it, though I can not well see why there should be a military camp at Fort Robinson. Thirteen or fourteen years ago it was an important point. Fifteen years ago the great body of Sioux Indians were there. They are all now farther east. The Sioux reservation is considerably east of that.

I am not able to observe myself, Mr. Speaker, the reason for this. I have the highest confidence in the judgment of my friend from Wisconsin, but I may be permitted to state that I recently had an opportunity of making a close examination of the geography of that region of the country, and I fear my friend has not considered the positions of Fort Hall and Fort Custer and the fort immediately south of the Sioux reservation, as well as the large line of forts upon the eastern boundary of the Sioux reservation. It seems to me that taking the country south from Devil's Lake, where we have an important military station—one of the most important in the West—there is not only no necessity for increasing the number, but there should be a reduction. I am satisfied there could be a reduction without injury to the service. I talked with military men at Fort Custer and at other points last fall, and they told me that by a reasonable reduction of the number of these military stations and a proper concentration of the troops the cost of transportation could be reduced readily a million dollars a year.

All over the country this state of things exists. For instance, at Santa Fé you have a single company of troops, while Fort Whipple and other forts are at a comparatively short distance farther west with large bodies of troops. I think the true policy is to concentrate our troops, for two reasons. First, the reduction of expense, and that would be very material. At present it is very heavy indeed. The cost of transportation is a very important feature of the expense of our Army, as all gentlemen know. The second is with a view to the improvement of the social life of our military posts. Where there are quite a large number of companies together you increase the social life and increase the pleasant relations of military men; you bring their families together, their wives and children; you elevate the tone and character of your military service.

I do not think my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], if he examined carefully in person the country west of the Missouri River, would favor this idea of his, if he studied the geography of the country completely, if he studied, as I have suggested, the situation of Fort Hall, Fort Custer, and the fort capable of being a great post immediately south of the great Sioux reservation and the line of forts on the Missouri River, as also the fort north of Devil's Lake, which commands that region of country; and Fort Berthold, which commands the Crow reservation and all that region of country. I do not think my friend from Wisconsin would press this measure if he had studied the geography of our country completely and the position of those forts.

As to the other measure proposed here—the training school for cavalry—it does not seem to me that is a measure of importance. Our soldiers ride very well. They do not have a great deal of riding to do. In the main, our Indians are in a very peaceful condition. The only Indians for some time past who have been disorderly were a very small portion of the Apaches in the White Mountain region of country. Those Indians were removed some years ago from the White Springs region of New Mexico. They were then a large and powerful band. They were removed from their old camping grounds in the midst of the harvest. They were thoroughly exasperated at that, and have been on the warpath since. They are inflexible in their enmity, but they were reduced, all told, last March to four hundred and sixteen. The portion of them who were on the war-path last summer consisted of thirty-seven men, including six boys, with ninety-one women and children. The others were in a perfectly peaceful condition, engaged in agricultural pursuits, raising barley, as seen by the committee of the House last summer, which they were selling at Fort Thomas at a dollar a bushel.

This small band of Chiricahua Indians, members of the Apache tribe of Indians, have been on the war-path for years, ever since they were removed from the White Springs reservation in New Mexico, and will be, I think, until they are exterminated. As I have said, they are inflexible in their hostility. They regard themselves as having suffered irreparable injustice. That is the only body of Indians we have to provide for keeping in a state of peace.

It does not seem to me the condition of the country requires an outlay of $200,000, or any other large sum, to improve our soldiers in their capacity for riding. They ride very well.

Mr. BRAGG. I regret I was not a member of the committee that had the privilege of traveling over the Northwest inspecting our dusky brethren, the Indians, last summer. Neither had I any opportunity of learning lessons of strategic position from my distinguished friend from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. Or any other civilian.

Mr. BRAGG. Or any other gentleman on that committee. I base my conception of this matter upon the judgment of a man who all concede does know something, even if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs does not.

We have often heard on the frontier there was nothing dangerous in the Indian. There was nothing dangerous in the Sioux before the battle of Big Horn and the massaere of Custer. There was nothing dangerous in the Apaches till they got mad. And that is precisely the condition of every other Indian. If my friend had those sixteen thousand peaceable Indians down in Indiana he might be able there by the use of this thing that shakes so much, called fever and ague, reduce them to a condition in which they might be Christianized to the Indiana religion.

Mr. DUNHAM. And become Democratic voters.

Mr. BRAGG. As they certainly would if they once had a good fair dose of common sense drilled into them. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAIRD. They have about the average of that already.

Mr. BRAGG. Let me refer to the gentleman on whose judgment I act. It was not possible for me to go and inspect this fort.

I read from the letter of General Philip H. Sheridan to the Committee on Military Affairs, dated March 31, 1885:

Fort Robinson (he does not say anything about Custer) is situated in the northwestern corner of Nebraska, very near to the southern limit of the great Sioux reservation, and but a few miles from the extension of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. (I think they are laying a track clear up to the reservation to-day.) The nearest military post (Fort Laramie) has now lost much of its military importance, while the location of Fort Robinson will make it a prominent point for many years to come. The concentration of troops and erection of the barracks and quarters necessary to their accommodation is therefore a wise military measure. For these reasons I heartily recommend the enactment of the various measures contemplated by this bill.

That is the voice of the man who represents the Army of the United States in the field. I am perfectly content to follow his judgment, and think I shall not commit the error of selecting an improper point at which to locate barracks and a post by following it, although I differ with the traveling committee. [Laughter.]

I call for the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I observe that the military authority——

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for the previous question on the third reading of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am afraid there is not a quorum present. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRAGG. Now is the time to test that. I move the previous question on the third reading of this bill.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question, and the chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 37.

So the previous question was not ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BRAGG. One moment, Mr. Chairman. If it is the purpose to raise the question of a quorum on this bill, the bill may as well be laid aside now so as not to use up the time of a committee who have already lost one day that was assigned to them by the discussion of other measures, and do not wish to waste their remaining time upon a bill as to which it is announced in advance that when the House comes to a vote the point of no quorum is to be made. I therefore respectfully ask my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to permit this bill to be laid aside.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will consent to that after I say a word. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] does not know how very valuable a trip out West would have been to him. [Laughter.] This camp, Fort Robinson, is 300 miles from the Sitting Bull country. You have to go clear across the great Sioux reservation diagonally before you reach Standing Rock, and that was the location of Sitting Bull.

Mr. BRAGG. What about the Pine River agency?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Pine River agency is in the southwestern portion of the great Sioux reservation, while the Sitting Bull field is exactly at the opposite point, that is, in the northeast. Standing Rock is within 40 miles of what is known as Cannon Ball River, and Cannon Ball River is the northern boundary of the great Sioux reservation. I mention these matters with care, because I wish to impress my friend with the belief that I know something about the geography of that country. [Laughter.]

One other word, Mr. Chairman, and then I shall yield to the request of my friend from Wisconsin. When he travels over that region of country he will see that even the Pine River agency can not last very long, not long enough to justify the expenditure of $200,000 in building a fortification to overlook it. That is a dry, arid region of country, where no Indian and no white man can make progress. The country farther to the northwest, which we acquired from the Sioux, the Black Hills region, is a very fine agricultural country; but the lands occupied by the Ogalalla Sioux and about five hundred Cheyennes (in all about eight thousand), who are the only Indians near Camp Robinson—that country is not adapted to agriculture at all.

If we intend or expect to have those Indians make any progress they must be removed from there, so that if you incur this expenditure you will find in the course of a few years that you have spent $200,000 at Camp Robinson and have at the same time moved away the last Indian from that portion of the country, because they can not live there. It is not a country for agriculture.

Mr. KLEINER. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Indians out there anywhere live by agriculture?

Mr. HOLMAN. They do not there.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MUSTER AND PAY OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND MEN.

Mr. BRAGG. I am directed by the committee to call up the bill (H. R. 1171) of which my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] has charge. The bill relates to the law to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 1 of "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," approved June 3, 1884, be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the joint resolution approved July 11, 1870, entitled 'Joint resolution amendatory of joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army, approved July 26, 1866, is hereby so amended and shall be so construed that in all cases arising under the same any person who was duly appointed and commissioned, whether his commission was actually received by him or not, shall be considered as commissioned to the grade therein named from the date from which he was to take rank under and by the terms of his said commission, and shall be entitled to all pay and emoluments as if actually mustered at that date: Provided, That at the date from which he was to take rank by the terms of his commission he was actually performing the duties of the grade to which he was so commissioned, or, if not so performing such duties, then from such time after the date of his commission as he may have actually entered upon such duties: And provided further, That any person held as a prisoner of war, or who may have been absent by reason of wounds or in hospital by reason of disability received in the service in the line of duty, at the date of his commission, if a vacancy existed for him in the grade to which so commissioned, shall be entitled to the same pay and emoluments as if actually performing the duties of the grade to which he was commissioned and actually mustered at such date: And provided further, That this act and the resolution hereby amended shall be construed to apply only in those cases where the commission bears date prior to June 20, 1863, or after that date when their commands were not below the minimum number required by existing laws and regulations: And provided further, That the pay and allowances actually received shall be deducted from the sums to be paid under this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be now considered in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, the change which this bill makes in the existing law is very slight. The present law, which is the act of June 3, 1884, provides that the joint resolution approved July 11, 1870, "shall be so construed that in all cases arising under the same any person who was duly appointed and commissioned, whether his commission was actually received by him or not, shall be considered as commissioned to the grade therein named from the date when his commission was actually issued by competent authority, and shall be entitled to all pay and emoluments as if actually mustered at such date." That is the existing law as passed in the Forty-eighth Congress. The bill before us changes that law by providing that the joint resolution of July 11, 1870, "be so construed that in all cases arising under the same any person who was duly appointed and commissioned, whether his commission was actually received by him or not, shall be considered as commissioned to the grade therein named from the date from which he was to take rank under and by the terms of his said commission, and shall be entitled to all pay and emoluments as if actually mustered at that date."

The difference between the pending bill and the existing law is that under the existing law a person promoted from the rank of enlisted man to that of an officer, or from one commissioned grade to another, takes his rank and muster from the date of the actual issue of his commission by competent authority, while under this bill he will take his rank and muster from the date from which, by the terms of his commission, he is to take rank.

Let me illustrate the reason for this legislation. For instance, in 1864, when we went into the Wilderness campaign, there were a great many officers killed and a great many vacancies created; but the campaign was continuous and arduous from day to day, so that the army did not make a halt sufficient to allow the filling of vacancies until late in June, when the army halted in front of Petersburg.

Then for the first time we had the opportunity to get out our regimental desks and make recommendations for promotions. But by that time some of the persons entitled to promotion were in prison, others were in hospital with wounds and unable to muster. In nearly all the States the commissions as finally issued, after naming the grade to which the officer was promoted, would read "to rank as such from —— date," the date usually being that when the vacancy was created, and from which the promoted man or officer had actually been performing the duties of the superior grade.

In the Forty-eighth Congress a bill precisely like this—House bill 7827—was unanimously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. Murray, but was not reached and did not become a law. The present bill comes to the House, I believe, upon a unanimous report by the Military Committee. It is designed simply to do justice to a considerable class of enlisted men and officers who in the midst of active campaigns were called upon through the creation of vacancies by death, capture, or otherwise to perform the duties of superior grades while holding inferior rank, and their commissions when subsequently issued contemplated that the promotion should date from the time when the vacancy was created and when the persons commissioned commenced to perform the duties of the higher grade.

I am instructed by the Military Committee to offer an amendment which will still further guard this bill. It is to make the proviso beginning in line 18 read as follows: "Provided, that at the date from which he was to take rank by the terms of his commission there was a vacancy to which he could be so commissioned, and that he was actually performing the duties of the grade to which he was so commissioned," &c. So that this bill provides in the first place that there must have been a vacancy to which the soldier could be promoted; in the second place, that he must have been actually performing the duties of a higher grade; and, thirdly, that he should have been subsequently commissioned as of that grade, and to rank from that date. Upon these three conditions—the existence of the vacancy, the performance of the higher duty, and the subsequent commission to rank from that date—the person is to be considered as though he had been in condition to receive his commission, and to have accepted it, and to have mustered upon it.

Mr. LONG. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. What would be the practical effect of passing this bill? What value would it be to the officer?

Mr. CUTCHEON. It will give him the difference in pay between the actual rank he held and the rank to which he was promoted, but to which he was by circumstances prevented from being mustered. Take the case of a first sergeant—and there are hundreds of such cases—who after battle finds himself in command of his company with his captain and lieutenant both killed, or one killed and the other captured, with a vacancy in the command; and that sergeant has to take actual command of the company, although he holds no higher rank than that of first sergeant.

By and by a recommendation is made to fill that vacancy, and the governor issues a commission in the course of two or three months, and it gets back to that sergeant, who is then able to be mustered in as captain. But during all the time he has been on duty as the commanding officer of his company he has borne all the responsibilities of commanding officer, incurred all the dangers of the position; he has carried the superior rank on his shoulder as a matter of fact, but yet has not received his commission.

This bill does justice to this class of men and gives them the difference of pay between the rank they actually held and the rank to which they were entitled if their commissions had been received promptly.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not that the existing law? I believe it is the act of March 3, 1884.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The act of June 3, 1884, permits them to be mustered of the date of issue of the commission. Take a case like this: A vacancy occurred at the battle of the Wilderness on the 6th day of May, but not until the 20th of June, on the arrival of the regiment at Petersburg, could the colonel get time to make out a recommendation in the case for transmission to the governor of Ohio or Michigan, and then the governor issued the commission bearing date the 1st day of July. But in the mean time ever since the 6th day of May that sergeant has been discharging the duties and incurring all the responsibilities of the higher position. It seems to the committee it is but an act of simple justice and this bill will provide the best means of reaching it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Michigan be kind enough to state how many will be affected by it? Has any calculation been made of the amount of money which the passage of the bill will draw from the Treasury to accomplish the object which the bill has in view?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am not able to state that in any degree of certainty. I do not think the Department could make any calculation without a great deal of labor and the employment of a large clerical force. I understand the act of June, 1884, which changes the day of muster from the time of the actual acceptance of the commission to the date of the actual issue of the commission, has not led to a large expense. I judge so from my own knowledge of the two classes of cases.

Mr. STORM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question with relation to the proviso? Why is that proviso restrained to commissions issued prior to June 20, 1863?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Under the law of Congress a general order was issued from the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army providing for officers of a certain character. For instance, a company which had less than what was known as the minimum, it could have but one second-lieutenant. It also provided where a regiment was below the maximum it could have but a lieutenant-colonel and a major. This respects that provision of the law.

Mr. KLEINER. Does this proposed act go back to 1861–1865 and cover all the cases?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, it covers all those cases.

Mr. KLEINER. There are thousands of those cases before the Committee on War Claims, and I should like to have the gentleman inform us as to the probable number, or as near as he can, if this present measureshould pass.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It would amount to a great many thousand cases. I can not give any estimate worthy the consideration of the House, because I have not the information.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Permit me to ask the gentleman from Michigan what effect this bill will make in the pension laws? I take it for granted if a person is now on the pension-rolls as a sergeant who was wounded while he was acting as lieutenant he would by this bill be put at the higher rate of lieutenant.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do not know what the rule would be in that regard; but I suppose if Congress gave him his muster-back and he was wounded in the Army while holding the rank of lieutenant——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I suppose he would be allowed the pension of the higher grade inasmuch as he was performing the duty and discharging the responsibilities of the higher grade, and we now give him the muster of the higher grade.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not like, Mr. Speaker, to seem to oppose a bill of this character under the circumstances.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to interrupt him for a moment I will state to him that I have had occasion to look into this matter, and I am satisfied that the rule in the Pension Office is to rate the pension on the rank that the party held, and not under the retroaction act.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. But I take it the operation of law would be in the case of a pension granted after the passage of this act like an order nunc pro tunc. The pension would be based upon the increased grade.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No; the Pension Office held otherwise. I had occasion to look into the matter, for I got a case through at this session of Congress and found that to be the ruling.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that I did not like to oppose a bill of this sort under the circumstances, but it seems to me that it ought to be more carefully considered than by the answers of the gentleman from Michigan to questions which have been propounded to him. It seems to have been considered by the committee; and we ought to have some information, certainly more than we now possess, as to the effect of the bill. It is in point of fact what may be called a back-pay bill. It is a bill which gives to certain officers the pay and emoluments which they have not received. How many officers, for how many months, what rank they held, and what the pay and emoluments are to be, or what is the aggregate amount covered by the bill, are facts which are wholly unknown to the House. Whether it will be a few thousand or some millions of dollars the information so far accessible gives no idea.

I do not mean to say that the amount of money that the bill covers, or the amount that is covered by a bill under any circumstances, is by any means the sole consideration when we come to pass the bill; for if it be an act of honesty or justice the House ought to pass it, no matter how much money it may require. But at this late date, twenty-two years after the campaign of the Wilderness of which the gentleman from Michigan speaks, and twenty-three years nearly from the date fixed in the bill—June 20, 1863—it can not be so great and pressing an act of justice as to require us to pass it on the spur of the moment without some more correct information and some more careful consideration. I take it for granted that it is nearly capable of an exact estimate at least of what it will cost.

Mr. BRAGG. I will state, with the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky, for his information, that I do not think it is within the range of possibilities to make the computation. It can not, however, be a very large sum, for the time would not permit of it.

The reason why I say it is not possible to make a computation is that there is no office that has the data. In the Adjutant-General's Office they have the data of men who were commissioned and mustered, but they have not the data as to what the governors of the States may have issued in the form of commissions, nor anything more than when a vacancy arose which could be filled by appointment in the regiment; the commissions all being issued by the different governors of the States, while the records are here in the Adjutant-General's Office of the Army.

Mr. ROWELL. Is it not true that all of these commissions are issued to take rank from the date of the vacancy?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; they ought to be, but they are not all issued that way.

Mr. ROWELL. But the pay was to commence in these cases from the date of the vacancy.

Mr. BRAGG. From the date of the vacancy; that is, if the officer filled the vacancy and discharged the duties, he was commissioned as of that date.

Mr. ROWELL. He must have actually performed the duty to get the pay?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes; and there must have been a vacancy.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Now I say, with great respect, it is not an act of justice according to my view to pay an officer for discharging temporarily the duty of a higher position which he assumes by virtue of the rank which he himself holds in a lower office in the same general class of service; and it is a bad precedent to establish. It is constantly being done in civil life. It is constantly being done in the military service as well, and to establish the precedent here of paying for that service is in my opinion a very bad one. A lieutenant upon the frontier frequently commands a post.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Suppose it happens to be the case of an enlisted man, and this man suddenly came into the position of a commissioned officer. He is compelled to do two or three things to fit himself for the position. First, he has to uniform himself, as many of them were compelled to do; second, he is deprived of drawing rations, as many were. Now, if he fails to get the commission or to be mustered under the commission and performs the duties, it would seem that he ought to be compensated for the service. Does not the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If that question had been submitted to me twenty years ago, and if I were standing where I am now, and if the circumstances of the case presented had warranted the action, I would have said it is better to do it. But we could have done it by a special act covering the particular case, rather than have the appearance of doing an act of injustice to a man who served in the Army.

But I would have said that as a general rule it ought not to have passed; that there might be special cases appealing on account of the special and peculiar facts, as in all special cases, to the consideration of Congress which would justify a special act, but it ought not to be adopted as a precedent, because that soldier and every other soldier in like circumstances did such things voluntarily. What I mean to say is that after the lapse of twenty-three years to attempt to do under the name of an act of justice by a general act this thing leads us into the payment of sums which are wholly unknown upon a principle which in my judgment is an erroneous principle.

Mr. KLEINER. Involving millions.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. My friend from Indiana thinks that it involves millions. I do not know as to that, but I am opposed to the principle.

I presume during the last war hardly any officer served on either side who was not called at some time or other to perform services incident to a higher rank than the rank he filled. There was hardly a colonel who did not at some time come into command of a brigade for months. A brigadier-general commanded a division frequently, and for a considerable period. Majors commanded regiments; lieutenants commanded companies. While in command they held their own rank while they were performing duties incident to a higher rank. They were doing it under and by virtue of their own commissions and their own rank.

Mr. LYMAN. This bill does not propose to pay them for that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. No; but it proposes to pay a certain class of persons exactly in the same predicament, except that these were permanently promoted, and received afterward the full payment of the rank to which they were promoted. While the class of which I am speaking did not receive the promotion, and therefore were never paid anything for the additional service, these persons after the lapse of time had got the rank to which they were entitled, and did for that rank receive pay.

Now, in what sense are they in any better condition and in what way are they deserving of more consideration than their brethren in the Army who did precisely the same as they did but did not receive permanent promotion?

To illustrate, at some of the battles of the Wilderness two regiments in the same brigade, under the same brigadier-general, lost their colonels, one by death, the other by capture. The lieutenant-colonel of one commands for two months his regiment, receives by promotion rank as colonel and the opportunity to become brigadier, but receives the pay of a colonel. You give him two months' extra pay. His brother officer commands his brigade for sixteen or eighteen months while his colonel is in prison. You give him no extra emolument, although he performed the same service without getting the additional rank and pay of colonel for the additional sixteen months.

If the precedent established by this bill is a good one, the next step is to say every one who served in the Army who performed higher duties than those of his rank shall be paid for the rank of the duty instead of the rank of the commission.

Mr. BRAGG. The case which the gentleman from Kentucky puts is a case in which it has been uniformly held by the committee of this House that the officers were entitled to no extra pay whatever. Those are cases of the class that come before the War Claims Committee. They are not within the purview of this bill at all.

This is an amendment of a general law which is already passed, but which fails to reach a few cases by the peculiarity of its wording. Now let me state a case to show the difference between the case the gentleman wishes to reach and the case as he wishes to put it. On the morning of the 5th day of May every officer in two companies of the Sixth Wisconsin Regiment was shot. A bright young man who was a member of Company G of that regiment, who had brains and nerve and who was fit to be an officer, was directed by the commanding officer of the regiment to take command of one of those companies as captain, and the commanding officer issued an order assigning him to duty as captain, with directions that he be obeyed and respected as such. That private soldier commanded that company up to the assault on Petersburg, when, while leading the company, he fell with three ribs and his shoulder-blade broken by a musket-ball on the 18th of June, 1864. Up to that time there had been no opportunity to communicate with the governor of his State for the purpose of giving him the promotion to which he had been assigned by the commanding officer and to which he was designated as qualified to fill that rank. He fell wounded a sergeant, and three weeks afterward came the commission from the governor commissioning him as a captain from the 5th day of May.

The bill provides that such a man as that shall draw his pay. Why? First, there was a vacancy in the office; second, he was assigned to discharge the duties of the office, and he did discharge them. He did not take the office by reason of his grade as a second lieutenant discharging a first lieutenant's duties, like a colonel discharging a brigadier-general's duties, or a lieutenant-colonel discharging a colonel's duties, but he was assigned to the duty of a given rank, and the governor of the State whose troops he belonged to recognized that assignment and commissioned him as of that rank. Now, by the wording of the old bill there is a slight discrepancy——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. By the wording of the old bill he would obtain his pay from the time that the commission was issued by the governor validating the act of the commander in the field that took him a private and made out of him temporarily a captain.

Mr. BRAGG. He would receive it only from the date of his commission.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Now, I take it for granted that if that young fellow was fit to be a captain in that interim and amid the horrors and the glories of that campaign, the pay which he was to receive never for one moment formed a part of the temptation to desire the office or of the sense of gratification with which he received it.

Mr. BRAGG. I can assure you that that is true; but it helped to take care of him afterward.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In the second place, the fact that he is to be a beneficiary of this bill does not change the evil precedent that is to be established by it.

Mr. BRAGG. He is not to be a beneficiary of it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. We ought not to allow a bad precedent, which is said to make shipwreck of the law, to be made a statute because some good and gallant fellow will thereby be benefited. Mr. Chairman, the idea I have is wholly this: I want to treat the soldiers of the late war not only with justice, but with generosity; but it seems to me that blindly rushing into measures of this sort under the idea that thereby we are doing justice to somebody constantly tempts us into unjustifiable expenditure of the public money and the establishment of unwise precedents. I am not willing to establish the precedent in this country, either in the civil service or in the military branch of the service, that the performance of the duties of a rank higher than that which the officer holds is a valid reason why he should receive the pay of that higher rank. Such assignments of duty are constantly taking place in the Departments. The assistant Secretary of the Treasury acts as Secretary; clerks are detailed as chiefs of bureaus; lieutenants are constantly discharging the duties of captains. This kind of assignment is necessary in the civil service, it is necessary in the military service, and it is setting a bad precedent to say that because these officers discharged temporarily duties of a higher rank than that which they held, therefore they ought to receive the salaries incident to that higher rank.

And it is particularly so in a case like this, after twenty years or more have passed, after the precise circumstances of any given case have become vague and the testimony perhaps doubtful, and when persons who do not deserve any specially good treatment are likely to be benefited. Now if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] has any special case in his mind (and I take it for granted that all these general laws are based upon a knowledge of special cases) I shall not hesitate to give my support to the suitable recognition of it if that recognition comes in a form to commend itself to my judgment.

Mr. KLEINER. Will not this legislation change the pension grade as well?

Mr. CONGER. No.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am not sufficiently familiar with the pension laws to answer the question with confidence. The gentleman from Iowa says that it does not. If he had not said no, I should had said, as a circuit-court lawyer not pretending to any special familiarity with the laws governing pensions that it would have that effect.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. Would it be any objection to this bill in the mind of the gentleman from Kentucky if it did raise the pension?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will answer as to that, with perfect frankness, that it would depend entirely upon the given case. As a rule, I answer frankly that it would be an objection.

As far as I know the pension law I know of no rank of pensions that I am in favor of raising. I think we are paying high enough pensions as to classes. As to particular cases, I say with equal frankness that I am perfectly willing in any given case to vote a pension commensurate with three things: first, the disability of the man who is to receive it; second, the present condition of the man as to his necessities; and third, the services that he rendered to the country in her day of peril. When those three conditions coexist in any given case, there is no man in this House who will more gladly vote to increase a pension.

Mr. CUTCHEON. One word more, Mr. Chairman. I think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] very largely exaggerates the consequences, or the probable consequences, of this bill. To begin with, the number of cases falling under it is not large. In the next place, the periods that intervened between the occurrence of the vacancy and the performance of the duty on the one hand and the issue of the commission on the other were generally not long. The amount to be taken out of the Treasury by this bill I venture to say would never be noticed.

We passed the act of 1884; it has been in operation for two years, and it must have affected more cases than this can possibly affect, yet it has gone on in the smooth process of its operation and we have never really been conscious by our appropriation bills or in any other way that the act was operative. I think this measure will take much less from the Treasury than that. I so infer from the nature of the case.

Mr. KLEINER. A large number of these cases, as I am informed, have already been acted upon and adjusted, and if this bill were passed they would all have to be reopened.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do not see force in that objection. The number of cases in which commissions date back is not so extensive as the other class, for the reason that the same rule was not adopted in the various States. In some States, for instance, the rank did not antedate the issue of the commission, but took effect from the date of the commission. In other States—in my own for instance—the rank did in some instances, though not in all, antedate the issue of the commission.

But I concur with what the gentleman from Kentucky said in the opening of his remarks, that the question is not whether this is going to take money out of the Treasury. The question is whether this is a measure of justice and whether it is right. I know that if it is right this nation is great enough and magnanimous enough to do right even if it does involve the expenditure of money. I am in favor of the bill whether it takes much money or little. But I have no apprehension as to the magnitude of the amount which carrying this bill into effect will require.

As I have already said, the bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs in the last Congress and it is again reported unanimously in this Congress. In order not to consume more time, as I see the hour is getting late, I move the previous question.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman withdraw that demand for just one minute? I desire to say a few words on this subject.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I give way to the gentleman.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, there are doubtless many hard cases which this bill is intended to remedy; but I maintain that we can not legislate wisely by undertaking in this manner to meet and remedy all hard cases. It is laid down as a fundamental principle by all writers upon constitutional and statutory law that the proper province of legislation is to prescribe rules which shall act prospectively, which shall apply to future cases. If by reason of defects in the law men have heretofore in some instances had to perform duties for which they never received compensation, let us remedy that defect in the law for the future. Let us enact such a law that this result will not follow in any case hereafter.

This bill, however, is essentially a bill providing for claims which have had heretofore no legal basis. It is therefore in the nature of a gratuity. However meritorious may have been the action of officers or privates filling stations above the grade that they actually held, there was no legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay them the compensation belonging to the higher rank; and to go back now and create a new contract and pay them what we think the law ought to have allowed them at that time is to legislate retrospectively, in violation of the most wholesome principles which should guide legislative bodies.

In this case, and almost any other where resort is had to general legislation for the purpose of remedying a few particular cases, it is impossible to see how far the measure reaches and what evil consequences may flow from it. I desire to do justice to every one, but when we are undertaking to do justice we can not do infinite justice. I remember that when I had the honor to be a member of the Committee on Claims in the Forty-seventh Congress claims were presented by civilian officers of the Government who had performed services belonging to higher grades, and who claimed the difference between the salary they had actually received and what they thought they ought to have been paid. But we can not go back to remedy the wrongs or supposed wrongs of the past. If the existing law is defective let us change it so as to provide wisely for the future, and then we shall get into no difficulty. But when we undertake to legislate retrospectively we can not foresee the consequences, and much evil may result.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I now offer on behalf of the committee the amendment I have already indicated; after which I shall call the previous question.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "commission," in line 20, insert "there was a vacancy to which he could be so commissioned, and that;" so that the clause will read: "Provided, That at the date from which he was to take rank by the terms of his commission there was a vacancy to which he could be so commissioned, and that he was actually performing the duties of the grade," &c.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. CUTCHEON was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BRAGG. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were—ayes 46, noes 3.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be laid aside.

Mr. WOLFORD. I move a call of the House.

Mr. BRAGG. I hope my colleague on the committee will not do that. There is never any good result from ordering a call of the House. It only incommodes members, occupies time, and results in nothing practical.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside, retaining its place on the Calendar. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

REMOVAL OF CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. BRAGG. I now move to take from the House Calendar the bill (S. 1471) to remove the charge of desertion from the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army against certain soldiers.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army against any soldier who served in the late war of the rebellion, by reason of his having enlisted in any regiment, troop, or company without having first received a discharge from the regiment, troop, or company in which he had previously served, shall be removed in all cases wherein it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records or from other satisfactory testimony, that such re-enlistment was not made for the purpose of securing bounty or other gratuity that he would not have been entitled to had he remained under his original term of enlistment: Provided, That no soldier shall be relieved under this act who, not being sick or wounded, left his command, without proper authority, while the same was in the presence of the enemy, or who, at the time of leaving his command, was in arrest or under charges, or in whose case the period of absence from the service exceeded three months.

SEC. 2. That in all cases where the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act, the Adjutant-General of the Army shall issue to such soldier, or, in case of his death, to his heirs or legal representatives, a certificate of discharge from the regiment, troop, or company in which he first served.

SEC. 3. That all applications for relief under this act shall be made to and filed with the Secretary of War within a period of five years from and after its passage, and all applications not so made and filed within such period of five years shall not be received or considered; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, the object of that bill is to provide as nearly as possible by general law for all cases of technical desertion which are worthy of consideration at the hands of Congress. We are snowed under almost with applications for removal of charges of desertion. But a small part of those which come to Congress would be relieved. That bill came to us from the Senate, and we have prepared it to take in every case which has manifested itself in the many bills filed before us which would repeat the interference of Congress by authorizing the record to be corrected.

The bill in brief is to relieve from the charge of technical desertion, which the Adjutant-General is unable to do under the fiftieth article of war, the enlistment with one command before proper discharge from another. It is an old article of war which came down to us from the English service.

The object of the bill is where a man shall have left one command and gone immediately into another, by reason of having met friends or anything of that sort, showing he did not intend to desert the service and did not leave in the presence of the enemy and made his second enlistment within thirty days and did it without any purpose of receiving bounty, shall not have attached to his record the stain of desertion, which to every honest and brave man is the greatest possible disgrace.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me ask the gentleman a question as to what exactly this bill covers. If a man did desert and enlist in another command and did in that second enlistment secure bounty, would this bill include such a case as that when it should appear to the satisfaction of the Adjutant-General he did not leave one command and join the other for the purpose of securing that bounty?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes; that is the way the bill reads.

Mr. PERKINS. I have a case in my mind. An Illinois boy served in a Missouri organization for more than eleven months. Subsequently an Illinois regiment was organized in his own neighborhood. He left the Missouri organization and joined his friends in the Illinois organization. He served gallantly and meritoriously for three years in that Illinois organization, and was mustered out with an honorable discharge. Now, he finds himself charged with desertion as a consequence of having left the Missouri organization and joined the Illinois organization. He stands charged with desertion on the records of the War Department. At the time he joined the Illinois organization he received bounty, but it was apparent to his friends and neighbors, as it is apparent from the evidence, he did not join for any such purpose. He was only eighteen years of age, and he did it because his playmates and school-fellows and all his friends were in the Illinois regiment. Is this bill broad enough to cover that case?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes; it is broad enough to cover that case.

Mr. BEACH. Is this bill broad enough to cover the case of an enlistment of a man in the regular Army. A case occurred recently where a man had enlisted at West Point Military Academy as a private soldier in the regular Army, but soon got tired and left and went to Governor's Island and there enlisted again on the 1st of December. That man is imprisoned as a deserter, although he had no intention in leaving West Point to desert the Army, but merely went off and enlisted a second time to get into a wider field. What I want to know is whether this bill will cover a case of that kind.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. It refers to any soldier who served in the late war of the rebellion.

Mr. BEACH. Why would it not be proper to make it broad enough to cover the case of the entire Army now?

Mr. HIESTAND. It ought not to cover all.

Mr. BRAGG. It would be very objectionable to permit an excuse under any circumstances, and for any purpose, for desertions from the regular Army. It would have the effect of inducing men to leave one regiment continually for the purpose of getting into another one.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And let me state to the gentleman from New York that upon an examination of the report of the year before last he will find that there were seven thousand desertions from the Army.

Mr. BEACH. That number has been rapidly diminishing since the passage of the retirement bill which I draughted and which passed in the last Congress.

Mr. BRAGG. I demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, NATCHEZ, MISS.

Mr. BRAGG. It is now quite late, and I will not present bills which will elicit any debate. In order to change the character of the busineis before the House I will call up House bill No. 1341, to construct a road to the national cemetery at Natchez, Miss.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a macadamized road from the city of Natchez, Miss., to the national cemetery near that city: Provided, That the right of way, not less than 75 feet in width, shall first be secured to the United States to the ground over which said road shall run: And provided further, That said road shall be constructed under the supervision of the Secretary of War, upon a contract let to the lowest bidder.

Mr. BRAGG. This bill is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the committee from its further consideration and consider it in the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BRAGG. I have no remarks to make on this bill. It is a meritorious bill or it would not have been reported from the committee.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY CEMETERY AT CHALMETTE, LA.

Mr. BRAGG. I now call up House bill No. 3440, making an appropriation to construct a macadamized road from the United States barracks in Saint Bernard Parish, Louisiana, to the national military cemetery at Chalmette, in said parish.

This bill is also on the calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

I ask unanimnous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from its further consideration and proceed to consider it in the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a macadamized road from the United States barracks in the parish of Saint Bernard, Louisiana, about one mile and a half, to the national military cemetery at Chalmette, in said parish.

SEC. 2. That the sum of money appropriated by this act shall be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of War, either by contract or otherwise, as to him may seem best.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress at its next session his action under the provisions of this act.

Mr. ST. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain in a few words the object of this bill. It is to connect by a macadamized road two important Government institutions situated on the left bank of the Mississippi River, in the parish of Saint Bernard, Louisiana, within 2 miles of each other.

The first of these places is the United States barracks, a very valuable property, now occupied by a battalion of artillery; and a mile and a half farther down the river, on the historic battle-ground of Chalmette, is located the United States military cemetery, in which are buried thirteen thousand Union soldiers. These two important institutions are now connected by a dirt road only, which, by the nature of the soil, is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to travel over during a large portion of the year.

It is highly desirable to establish easy and ready communication between these two Government properties in order that they may properly serve the purposes for which they were respectively designed. When death summons a soldier from his post at the barracks his final resting-place is found under the willows of Chalmette. Thither he is followed by his comrades in arms, and many a time upon their shoulders they have borne their dead companion to his grave in single file upon the crest of the levee, the impassable condition of the mud road forbidding any other mode of conveyance.

And again on Decoration Day, an occasion always observed with becoming respect and honor alike by the blue and the gray, the friends and relatives of the dead soldiers who delight to do honor to their memories are thwarted in their patriotic purposes by the present lack of facilities that will enable them to mark the spot where sleep their respected dead.

And now they ask that the Government, out of its bounty, will not forget those who stood by it in its hour of danger and gave up their lives in its maintenance, and that the small appropriation asked for in the bill now before this House will be granted without opposition.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommend the adoption of the bill, and I indulge the hope that it will meet with a unanimous vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, KNOXVILLE, TENN.

Mr. BRAGG. I now call up House bill No. 5866 to construct a road to the national cemetery at Knoxville, Tenn., also on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I make the same request in reference to this bill, that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be considered in the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $6,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a macadamized road, commencing on the southeast side of the national cemetery, on Broad street, at Knoxville, Tenn., where Holston street connects with said Broad street, and running with said Holston street to the line of Gray Cemetery, and thence with the line of and over said Holston street with the lines of Gray Cemetery and the said national cemetery, to Munson street, at the northeast corner of the said national cemetery, and thence with the line of said national cemetery and over said Munson street to the Jacksborough road, at the northwest corner of said cemetery, and thence south with the line of said national cemetery and over the said Jacksborough road to the corner and opposite the line dividing the national cemetery and the said Gray Cemetery grounds: Provided, That the right of way, not less than seventy-five feet in width, shall first be secured to the United States to any part of the ground over which said road shall run not now owned by the United States: And provided further, That said road shall be constructed under the supervision of the Secretary of War, upon a contract let to the lowest responsible bidder.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to carry this act into effect as soon as practicable after its passage, from which date it is hereby declared to take effect.

Mr. BRAGG. The committee instruct me to submit the following amendment, to strike out the words "seventy-five," in line 19 of the first section of the bill, and insert "fifty;" so that it will read:

Not less than 50 feet in width.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT SELDEN MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. BRAGG. I now call up House bill No. 661, granting the right of way through the Fort Selden military reservation, in New Mexico, to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company, and I also ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be considered in the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the right of way to the extent of 100 feet, and no more, in width, through the Fort Selden military reservation, New Mexico, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI HOME GUARDS.

Mr. BRAGG. I call up from the House Calendar for consideration the bill (S. 216) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates of discharge to certain members of the Missouri Home Guards.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish, upon their several applications therefor, a certificate of discharge to each and every member of the Missouri Home Guards whose claims for pay were adjudicated by the Hawkins-Taylor commission, under the act approved March 25, 1862, and the several acts supplementary thereto.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES BARRACKS AT BATON ROUGE, LA.

Mr. BRAGG. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 985) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at said place for educational purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. VIELE. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Whereas the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., are not occupied by the Government or needed at the present time for any governmental purpose whatever; and

Whereas the said barracks and grounds are especially adapted for educational purposes: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at Baton Rouge the buildings and grounds of the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, for the purposes of the said university and college: Provided, however, That the board of managers of the same shall keep the buildings insured and in good repair: And provided further, That whenever the said buildings and grounds cease to be used for educational purposes by the said university and college they shall revert to the Government of the United States, and they shall so revert whenever the Government of the United States shall have use for the same.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommended the following amendment:

In line 3 strike out "War" and insert "Interior."

Mr. VIELE. I now move to amend the House bill by substituting for it the Senate bill (S. 1659) which is precisely to the same purport.

This is simply to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to transfer to the State University of Louisiana and the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Baton Rouge the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, which are now in possession of the Department of the Interior. The bill provides that if at any time the Government requires the use of these barracks they will revert to the Government. The institution is now without buildings, their buildings having been destroyed by fire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York desires to substitute the Senate bill or offer the Senate bill as a substitute for the House bill?

Mr. VIELE. I move to amend the House bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 1659) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La, except that portion that lies westward of a line 50 feet east of the center of the railroad track of the Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railroad Company, to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at said place for educational purposes.

Whereas the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., are not occupied by the Government or needed at the present time for any governmental purpose whatever; and

Whereas the said barracks and grounds are especially adapted for educational purposes: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at Baton Rouge the buildings and grounds of the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, for the purposes of the said university and college, except that portion of said grounds that lies westward of a line 50 feet east of the center of the railroad track of the Louisville, New Orleans, and Texas Railroad Company, and said excepted lands may be used and occupied by said railroad company; but should said railroad company cease to use and occupy said lands, then the possession shall revert to the United States: Provided, however, That the board of managers of the said university and college shall keep the buildings insured and in good repair: And provided further, That whenever the said buildings and grounds cease to be used for educational purposes by the said university and college they shall revert to the Government of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Upon what terms does the railroad company now occupy the land spoken of in the bill?

Mr. BRAGG. They are occupied under license from the Secretary of War, heretofore granted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. And can the Secretary of War terminate their occupancy at any time?

Mr. BRAGG. They are now under control of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PERKINS. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VIELE] that the bill does not go quite to the extent he suggested in this respect. It is provided that whenever the buildings and grounds cease to be used for educational purposes they shall revert to the Government of the United States; but there is no provision that they shall revert to the Government in the event of the Government having use for them. I think in that respect the bill is defective.

Mr. IRION. The original bill as introduced in the House did contain a clause of that kind, but it was introduced before these grounds were turned over to the Interior Department for sale. At that time the barracks were under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War. I introduced a bill at this session of Congress which inadvertently had that provision in it. These grounds have been transferred by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Interior for the purpose of becoming part of the public domain. It is not the intention, therefore, of the Government to use them any more as barracks or for the accommodation of troops. Unless the grounds are transferred to the State University they will be sold by the Secretary of the Interior as part of the public domain. Consequently they could not revert, under the order as it now is, to the United States for war purposes.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRICE. As I understand the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VIELE], it is to strike out all of the House bill, after the enacting clause and insert the Senate bill. Would that not make it necessary that the bill should go to the Senate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ascertained that this is a bill which is still pending in the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Was it the Senate bill that was read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was. The Clerk will read again that part of the bill which refers to the buildings and grounds reverting to the Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the board of mangers of the said university and college shall keep the buildings insured and in good repair: And provided further, That whenever the said buildings and grounds cease to be used for educational purposes by the said university and college they shall revert to the Government of the United States.

Mr. STEELE. We provide those buildings shall be kept insured. If we give them to the State of Louisiana what business of ours is it whether they are insured or not?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest as an amendment to insert after the word "college" the words "or shall be required for the use of the United States." We are constantly disposing of lands near towns and cities and find after a short time we require other property there. It is very well to retain some general supervision of our property under such circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 19, after the word "college," insert "or when required for the use of the United States."

Mr. HOLMAN. I may be mistaken as to the effect of that amendment coming in at that point, and I ask that that portion of the bill be read as it would stand if so amended.

Mr. LONG. That amendment leaves open the question who shall determine that it is required for the use of the United States. I suggest, therefore, that it be amended so as to read "or when required by the Secretary of War for the use of the United States.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that, inasmuch as the last Congress passed a law turning over this military reservation, with others, to the public domain, it falls under the control of the Interior Department, and therefore the Secretary of the Interior ought to be substituted in this amendment for the Secretary of War.

Mr. IRION. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior both have been consulted, and the report shows that they say there is no reason whatever why this transfer should not be made.

Mr. LAIRD. But the reservation is now under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. IRION. It is now under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. Of course the object of this bill is to make an absolute donation of this property to the university. The university is without any buildings at all. The buildings have been destroyed by fire, and the university has none suitable for its purposes. These buildings are on this reservation; they are going to ruin; they are of no use to any one, and the fact of this property having been, by a previous act of Congress, placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior for sale, is an indication that the intention of Congress was that it should not be used any more for military purposes, but should be abandoned. Now, if the amendment which is proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr.

HOLMAN] should be adopted, the property could be taken out of the hands of the institution at any time hereafter. The amendment really has the effect of taking the property out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, where it has been placed by Congress, and throwing it back under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. STEELE. If it was intended that this should be an absolute donation, why was the provision inserted in the bill requiring the property to be kept insured?

Mr. IRION. That might be stricken out.

Mr. BEACH. As I understand it, this is a donation of the property conditioned upon its being used for educational purposes.

Mr. IRION. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEACH. Now, what we want to provide for is that when it ceases to be used for such purposes it shall revert to the General Government.

Mr. IRION. That is in the bill now without this amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The question is upon the amendment providing for the reversion of the property in case it shall hereafter be required by the United States, and the matter is debated as to whether that reversion should be at the instance of the Secretary of War or at the instance of the Secretary of the Interior. I submit that the only occasion upon which the United States would ever be likely to require such a reversion would be in some public emergency arising out of hostilities, in order that some military use might be made of the reservation, and therefore I think it should be at the instance of the Secretary of War, who would be the most proper judge of such an emergency requiring the use of the property.

The amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN to the pending amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "insured," the words "for the use of the United States." We require them to keep these buildings insured, and it ought to be for the benefit of somebody. We still own the property.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the sixteenth line, after the word "insured," insert the words "for the use of the United States."

The House divided on the amendment offered by Mr. PRICE; and there were—ayes 31, noes 1.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York as amended. The Clerk will report the amendment as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the board of managers of the said university or college shall keep the buildings insured for the use of the United States, and in good repair.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Mr. Chairman, I think unanimous consent ought to be given to transpose certain phrases in the amendment. I think they are misplaced.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BEACH. Would it be in order, Mr. Chairman, to ask for the reading of the bill as amended?

Several MEMBERS. "No!" "No!"

The CHAIRMAN. The bill can be again reported by unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Chairman, I want to know what this "repairing" is. Is it repairing the bill, or the buildings, or the insurance? [Laughter.] Would it be in order to inquire if these buildings could be insured in an insurance company at Newburg, in the State of New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. BEACH. We have not got any there.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VIELE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPH OPERATORS DURING THE WAR.

Mr. BRAGG. I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 7886) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRAGG. It should not have been referred there, as it contains no appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was so referred.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be now considered in the House.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all persons engaged in the operation and construction of military telegraph lines during the war of the rebellion are hereby declared to have been a part of the Army of the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to prepare a roll of such persons, and to issue to each, upon application, unless it appears that his service was not creditably performed, a suitable certificate of honorable discharge, reciting this act and the term and character of his service: Provided, That this law shall not be construed to entitle the persons herein mentioned to any pay or allowance or any benefits of pension, bounty, or land laws other than that heretofore received by them.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, there were—ayes 33, noes 8.

Mr. BEACH. No quorum.

Mr. PRICE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection to the withdrawal of the bill; but I do not want it to be in a position to be passed when we meet here again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill under consideration be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRISON. I object to that; let the gentleman withdraw the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What would be the effect of agreeing to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HOLMAN. It would leave the bill exactly as it stood before it was taken up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that if the bill be laid aside upon this request it will simply stand as if it had never been called up.

Mr. MORRISON. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. PRICE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

ORDNANCE FOR STATE MILITIA, ETC.

Mr. BRAGG. I now call up the bill (H. R. 1077) for replacing unserviceable ordnance issued to the militia of the States and Territories.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. VIELE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be now considered in the House.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed, on the application of the States and Territories, to recall from time to time all unserviceable, and unsuitable ordnance and ordnance stores which have been or may be issued to the militia of the several States and Territories under existing laws, and to replace them with like ordnance and ordnance stores of standard caliber and model as supplied to the troops of the permanent establishment; and a sum sufficient for the purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs were read, as follows:

In line 5, insert before the word "unserviceable" the word "obsolete."

In line 6, strike out the words "issued to" and insert "in the hands of."

After the word "laws," in line 8, insert "subject to such regulations and limitations as he may prescribe for their inspection and receipt."

In lines 12, 13, and 14, strike out the words "a sum sufficient for the purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert the following:

"For the purpose of providing the necessary ordnance and ordnance stores to replace those recalled a sum sufficient in amount to meet the difference of cost between new ordnance and ordnance stores and the estimated value of those returned is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no ordnance or ordnance stores shall be issued to any State or Territory in excess of the actual requirements of such State or Territory; and in the event of any reduction in the militia of any State or Territory, such excess shall be returned to the United States: And provided further, That the ordnance and ordnance stores for the whole body of the militia authorized by law to be issued to the States and Territories shall be annually accounted for by them, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this bill is subject—at least without explanation—to a quite serious objection. It makes an indefinite appropriation of money; and it is impossible, I presume, without a report from the Secretary of War, to form any judgment as to what the expense will be.

Mr. LONG. There is a report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. VIELE. The object of this bill is to enable the several States to possess in the hands of the militia arms which will have the same uniform caliber as the arms in the general service of the United States. The great difficulty in time of war when there are different calibers or arms in the hands of different troops is the impossibility of getting suitable ammunition at the proper time for necessary use. This bill is designed simply to secure a uniform caliber of all the arms issued to the militia of the several States and Territories. A letter on this subject from the Secretary of War says:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, February 20, 1886.

SIR: In response to your note of the 26th ultimo, inclosing a copy of House bill 1077, "for replacing unserviceable ordnance issued to the militia of the States and Territories," with request for such suggestions and remarks as I may deem proper, I beg to inform you that after a consultation on the subject with the Chief of Ordnance certain amendments which are believed to be necessary have been added, and I beg to inclose herewith a copy of the bill with the proposed amendments inserted therein.

As thus amended, the bill is believed to be a meritorious one and entirely in the interests of our militia, and its passage is recommended both by the Chief of Ordnance and by the Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. ENDICOTT, Secretary of War.

Hon. G. W. DARGAN,
Of Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. BEACH. That letter does not give us any idea of the amount of money involved in this change.

Mr. LONG. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] that there are two limitations upon the expenditure to be made under this bill. One is that the measure is to be carried out under the direction of the Secretary of War, and under such regulations as he shall prescribe. In the second place, the bill provides merely for an exchange of arms. If the State of Illinois, for instance, should send in some unserviceable rifles the United States would pay the difference in value; and that difference would diminish in proportion to the value of the arms returned.

The object of the bill is to secure uniformity of arms and ordnance and ordnance stores issued to the several States out of the fund the Government has provided for that purpose. In providing the necessary ordnance and ordnance stores to replace those recalled, a sum sufficient in amount is appropriated to meet the difference of cost between new ordnance and ordnance stores and the estimated value of those returned; and such replacement of obsolete, unserviceable, and unsuitable ordnance and ordnance stores with like ordnance and ordnance stores of standard caliber and model as supplied to the troops of the permanent establishment is made under existing laws, subject to such regulations and limitations as the Secretary of War may prescribe for their inspection and receipt.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin, in view of the thinness of the House, ought not to press that bill. We have no opportunity to judge what it will cost to carry that law out.

Mr. BRAGG. We make an annual appropriation of $200,000 to furnish arms for distribution to the States and Territories. There is a bill already pending to make it $600,000, which has been reported back from the Committee on the Militia, reducing it to $400,000. That money is to be expended for arms to be distributed among the several States and Territories. They will be exchanged for unserviceable arms, or arms not of the present caliber, returned by the States to the General Government. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems we should have very definite information on the subject; at least some idea of just exactly what this is to cost us. As to the bill itself, it is very indefinite, although it seems to have been revised by the head of the Ordnance Office. I think, inasmuch as this is not a matter of present necessity, it can be safely postponed; and I hope, under the circumstances, it will be postponed.

Mr. BRAGG. If there is objection we will lay the bill aside for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to move the bill to be laid aside.

Mr. BRAGG. Very well, then; I will submit the motion the bill be laid aside by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN A. RAWLINS.

Mr. BRAGG. I propose next to call up for present consideration a bill to which I know no one will object. I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 606) authorizing the removal of the statue of Maj. Gen. John A. Rawlins from its present location to a site to be selected by the Secretary of War.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to have the statue of Maj. Gen. John A. Rawlins removed from the present location to another site within the limits of the city of Washington, D. C., to be selected by the Secretary of War; and an amount not exceeding $500 is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to hear from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] in reference to this matter. Has the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had occasion yet to consider the proposition which came from the Senate in regard to the monument to Peace which was erected by the Navy on the west front of the Capitol, and as to the occupation of that space as well as other and corresponding ground south for the statues of two famous men? Perhaps the gentleman may think it advisable, if his committee has considered that measure, to take it up now and act on it in connection with this bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I should be glad to aid the gentleman.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will state, the business of that committee has not yet reached the consideration of the matter concerning the statue of Christopher Columbus, and the statue of the Marquis Lafayette referred to that committee by the House. It has only recently come over from the Senate, and therefore I can not say anything for the committee on that subject. I am not prepared to introduce any amendment on that subject at present. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF LAND NEAR SAN ANTONIO, TEX.

Mr. BRAGG. I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7183) to authorize the purchase of a certain tract of land near San Antonio, Tex.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is, authorized and directed to purchase and to acquire a valid title to, for the United States, a certain tract of land lying in the county of Bexar, in the State of Texas, near the city of San Antonio, consisting of 310 acres, more or less, and being the same now held by the United States for a drill-ground under a rental contract with John H. Kampmann, and dated July 1, 1885.

SEC. 2. That in order to make said purchase and to acquire said title the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, upon the order of the Secretary of War, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, which is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of purchasing and acquiring a valid title to said tract of land.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL BARRACKS AT NATIONAL HOMES.

Mr. BRAGG. I now call up the bill (H. R. 5401) making appropriations for additional barracks at the Southern, Northwestern, and Western branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. DUNHAM. I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that, inasmuch as he has all day to-morrow, it is time to adjourn.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. This is the last bill to be called up to-night before adjournment.

Mr. BRAGG. After this I will make the motion myself.

I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of this bill and that it be considered in the House.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, under the direction of the Board of Managers, in the construction and equipment of additional barracks or quarters for disabled veterans at the Southern, Northwestern, and Western branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, located at Hampton, Milwaukee, and Leavenworth, respectively.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The later motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BRAGG (at 10 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 5, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting letters from the Supervising Architect of that Department in regard to appropriations for repairs of the mint building at New Orleans, La., and the custom-house at Buffalo, N. Y.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORIAL LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the secretary of Utah Territory, forwarding, as required by sections 1844 and 1850 of the Revised Statutes, two copies of the laws of that Territory enacted by the twenty-seventh session of the Legislative Assembly; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORT OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY BUREAU.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Public Printer; which was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he hereby is, directed to inform the Senate the cause of the delay in furnishing to Congress for distribution the 50,000 copies of the first annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry as authorized by the joint resolution approved July 5, 1884," and in answer thereto I beg to say that, in ordering the 50,000 copies of the first report on animal industry, Congress failed to make the necessary appropriation with which to execute the order. Such being the case, the cost must necessarily be charged to the general appropriation for Congress.

The general appropriation for the present fiscal year was reduced $250,000 below the previous appropriation for long session, and $426,107 below the estimates of this office.

The press facilities of this office are not sufficient to do all the printing ordered, and work on a number of reports was necessarily postponed, among them this one. With the reduced appropriation the presses can not run extra, and I have been compelled, first, to provide the current work for Congress and the Departments and print such reports as could be reached thereafter.

I did print a small edition for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture (as in several other cases), and the deliveries were as follows: Senate, 2,516; Department of Agriculture, 4,833; House of Representatives, 472.

There is one paragraph in the circular of the Commissioner of Agriculture upon this subject, which was laid before the Senate and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the 4th instant, which requires explanation. He says:

"I deem it my duty to state these facts in order to relieve this department of any responsibility for what seems to be an unreasonable and unwarranted delay in the delivery of a report which Congress provided for nearly two years ago."

It is true that Congress did order this work printed, but it is equally true that no special appropriation was made therefor; hence it will be observed that the Commissioner's statement that "Congress provided for" its publication is misleading, and calculated to do this office an injustice, which of course was unintentional.

The Public Printer intends to comply with the law, and will not exceed appropriations, and if orders are made for which no special appropriation is provided, such printing must inevitably wait until it can be reached from the general appropriation for Congress.

In conclusion, therefore, I beg to say that the first report on animal industry has not been completed because—

First. No special appropriation was made for its publication, as was the case of the second annual report of the same work; and Second. The general appropriation was reduced $250,000 as compared with the previous long session, and $426,107 less than the estimates for the year (being the same amount as was provided for the short session of Congress, with four months' less expenditure for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and other current Congressional work), which, with the limited press facilities, made it absolutely necessary to postpone printing the first report.

It should be remembered that a certain sum of the general appropriation is allotted for the various Executive Departments, and that the current printing for the daily use of Congress and its committees must have precedence over all annual and other reports. The reduction of the appropriation without a corresponding reduction of the orders for printing inevitably leads to the postponement of the work.

I have been very much embarrassed by this state of affairs, and have endeavored to oblige Congress and all the Departments of the Government. Instead of a reduction of printing, the demands upon this office during this session are much larger than ever before.

I am, sir, with respect, your obedient servant,

S. P. ROUNDS, Public Printer.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

Mr. MANDERSON. This communication from the Public Printer is in response to a resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who I see is absent. I therefore ask that it lie on the table until he shall return, for such disposition as he shall see fit to suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is the desire of the Senator from Missouri that the communication shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANDERSON. If he so suggested, I make no objection to that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TELLER. It will be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed under the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a petition of the American Colonization Society, praying that an appropriation of $25,000 be made for the purpose of making an examination of that portion of the African coast which lies between the coast of Liberia and the Niger River. The petition was prepared, as I am informed, by Mr. Justice Strong, formerly of the Supreme Court of the United States, and as it is very condensed and the facts are all presented in a concise form, I will ask that it be printed in the RECORD or read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the petition presented by him be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of the American Colonization Society respectfully represents:

Without entering into the history of the society, it is assumed that your honorable body is aware that in 1821 it succeeded in establishing on the west coast of Africa the colony of Liberia; which, increasing year after year in numbers and extent of territory, became strong enough in 1847 to declare its independence, and has since been recognized by the United States and the civilized governments of Europe as a member of the family of nations.

Established, originally, "to promote and execute a plan for colonizing, with their own consent, the free colored people of the United States in Africa," the functions of the society, in this respect, ceased to be peculiar when slavery ceased; and it has since existed "to aid the colonization of Africa by voluntary emigration, and to promote there the extension of Christianity and civilization."

In this work your memorialists have an especial interest, due to the origin of Liberia and to their sympathy with its people; but your memorialists respectfully suggest that the interest of the United States in the growth of Liberia in population and extent is greater still.

Formerly England stood alone in African exploration; to-day France, Germany, Belgium, Austria, Holland, Italy, Spain, and Portugal are engaged in the work. All are prompted, if not impelled, by the necessity of finding new markets for the ever-increasing surplus of manufacturing industry.

It is very true that, with the vast territory and increasing population of the United States, the necessity of seeking new markets beyond its borders may not exist here as in European nations, or not to the same extent. But this exception can not last forever. Even now there are signs that new markets are needed by our manufacturers and for our laborers; and it is suggested that it is by no means too soon to make available, by exploration of the interior of Liberia, the opening to new markets that philanthropy has afforded since 1821.

There is in the interior of Liberia a fertile and thickly inhabited country, which can be brought into closer communication with the coast line of the republic, extending from the British colony of Sierra Leone to the Rio San Pedro, east of Cape Palmas, a distance of between four and five hundred miles.

It is to this country extending northwardly to the Niger at Timbuctoo, and including the headwaters of that great river, that Liberia affords an access, the advantages of which are peculiar to the United States, not by virtue of any treaty stipulation, but through the natural sympathy of the Liberian people, to whom the United States is the mother country to which they are to look for that increase of population which is alone wanting to the development of their power, and which emigration from this country can alone supply.

Apart, however, from the commercial view of the subject, your memorialists respectfully suggest that the benefit that would accrue to Liberia should, of itself, be more than sufficient to induce Congress to authorize the exploration in question. From the beginning, the feeling between the United States and the people of Liberia and their government has been that of sympathy and consideration, dating back from the time when Mr. Monroe found that the existence of the society's colony would enable him to meet the requirements of the act of Congress of March 3, 1819, which required negroes, recaptured from slaveships by United States vessels, to be restored to their native country, and induced him to furnish means without which the colony might never have existed or have been indefinitely postponed.

It was manifested again in 1846, when Mr. Upshur, then Secretary of State, defined the relations between the colonists and the United States on the occasion of a dispute in regard to the right of the Liberian authorities to enforce the revenue laws of the colony in a particular case against a British vessel. He then wrote to Mr. Fox, the British minister: "Although no apprehension is entertained that the British Government meditates a wrong to this interesting settlement, yet the occasion is deemed a fit one for making known, beyond a simple answer to your inquiries, in what light it is regarded by the people and Government of the United States. It is due to Her Majesty's Government that I should inform you that this Government regards it as occupying a peculiar position and as possessing peculiar claims to the friendly consideration of all Christian powers; that the Government will at all times be prepared to interpose its good offices to prevent any encroachment by the colony upon the just rights of any nation, and that it would be very unwilling to see it despoiled of its territory rightfully acquired, or improperly restrained in the exercise of its necessary rights and powers as an independent nation."

Although in the forty years that have since elapsed great changes have taken place in other respects, there has been no change in the feeling that inspired Mr. Upshur's letter; and it is only recently that the United States accepted the position of umpire in a dispute between England and Liberia in regard to the boundary between the republic and the colony of Sierra Leone.

It is with a strong reliance upon the feeling thus manifested during so many years, as well as upon the commercial interests of the United States, that your memorialists ask Congress for an appropriation of $25,000, to be expended under the sanction of the Secretary of the Navy, for making explorations on the west coast of Africa, and from Liberia into the interior of the continent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition and accompanying papers will be so referred.

SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, and in the Senate by Hon. WARNER MILLER, of New York, for a tax of 10 cents a pound on all imitations of butter; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MAHONE presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Petersburg, Va., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCPHERSON presented the petition of Sarah L. Brookfield, of Washington, D. C., praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1935) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to enlarge, repair, and complete certain military quarters and barracks in Wyoming Territory and in the State of Nebraska, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 776) granting arrears of pension to Catherine Lanigan, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2349) granting a pension to Catherine Lanigan; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4699) granting a pension to Martin Jacoby;

A bill (H. R. 1560) for the relief of Evaline A. White;

A bill (H. R. 1707) granting a pension to Elijah P. Hensley; and

A bill (H. R. 5328) granting a pension to Noah Hoffman.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1201) granting a pension to Louise Ambrecht, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 962) touching the grade of commander in the Navy and to correct an error in relation to an appointment therein, to report it adversely.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from South Carolina if that is the bill adversely acted upon by the committee this morning relative to the restoration of a commander?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I hope the Senator will allow it to be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 980) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clarke's Fork Railroad Company, have instructed me to report it back with amendments. That bill was taken from the Calendar, having been reported by the Committee on Railroads and referred to the Committee on Territories. I have been instructed by a majority of that committee to ask that the bill be restored to the position it occupied on the Calendar before it was referred to the Committee on Territories, so that it shall not lose its position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina, that this bill be placed on the Calendar in the position it formerly occupied before it was referred to the Committee on Territories? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANDERSON. On Senate bill No. 980, reported by the Senator from South Carolina, on behalf of the majority of the Committee on Territories, I submit the views of the minority.

RECLAMATION OF TEXAS AND MEXICAN STOCK.

Mr. MORGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a resolution pertaining to our relations with Mexico in respect to cattle-ownership on the border, to report back a substitute for the resolution, and I ask that it be immediately considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the boundary line between the Republics of the United States and Mexico in much of its length divides a grazing and stock-growing country, which lies on each side thereof; and

Whereas horses and cattle may and do cross said line at will, the same interposing no obstruction thereto; and

Whereas, in the absence of some treaty provision between the two countries for the reclamation of stock thus crossing said boundary line, the citizens of the two countries are liable to become embroiled:

Therefore, for the purpose of averting such complications as in consequence thereof may ensue between the two countries,

Resolved, as the judgment of the Senate, That it is desirable that some arrangement be made with the Government of Mexico on the subject adequate to the repression of the evil aforesaid and promotive of peace and good-will between the two countries.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolution be respectfully transmitted to the President of the United States.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2350) granting an increase of pension to Peter Casserleigh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2351) granting a pension to James Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2352) for the relief of Royal E. Dake; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 2353) granting a pension to William Barden; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 2354) granting an increase of pension to Philo B. Buckingham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2355) granting a pension to Edward R. Shubrick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2356) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Keffer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 2358) to amend the law relating to international extradition; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2361) granting a pension to Louis Heidel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. MAHONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, making an appropriation of $20,000 to enable the Secretary of War to lay a submarine cable from Cape Charles to Cape Henry; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

THE PASSPORT CHARGE.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration, and I will say one word about it:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what necessity, if any, exists for the continuance of the present charge for passports to citizens of the United States desiring to visit foreign countries, and whether in his opinion the charge now made can be reduced or dispensed with without detriment to the public service.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BECK. I might have introduced a bill for this purpose, but I was not sure that it would be wise to do so without information. Looking at the matters we have been considering for the last few days, especially the expedition of our mails to Tampa and our connections with Cuba and the probable building up of trade with other islands, I did not see why we ought to charge each of our citizens $5 for the privilege of going there, he paying, of course, the charge of $4 for viséing our passports, in regard to which we can, perhaps, negotiate. I think we ought to see if we can not dispense with that charge at least. Under one of our standing laws our people have to pay $5 for each passport. The object of the resolution is to see if there is any reason why the law should not be repealed.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONDITION OF COLORED PEOPLE.

Mr. CULLOM. If there is no further morning business, I ask that the regular order may be proceeded with.

Mr. LOGAN. Before we proceed with the unfinished business I desire to make an inquiry. I introduced a bill early in the session, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, providing for a commission to inquire into the condition of the colored people of the South. I have not been able to get the bill reported back, and I ask the chairman of the committee whether it can not be reported back to the Senate. I desire to have a report upon it one way or the other, so that I may have the action of the Senate on the bill before it gets too late. This is the second Congress at which I have introduced a bill of a similar character, and I did it with the desire to have the action of the Senate upon it. I hope the chairman of the committee will have the question decided in committee and have it reported to the Senate so that action may be taken upon it.

Mr. BLAIR. When the bill came to the Committee on Education and Labor it was referred to a subcommittee, who have not as yet reported. I do not see the chairman of the subcommittee in the Chamber at this time. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] is the chairman of the subcommittee. I do not know why there should not be action upon it, and I will remind the subcommittee, and perhaps the Senator from Illinois will do so himself.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall be very glad to do so. I did not know who the subcommittee were. I shall be very glad to notify them.

Mr. BLAIR. I have myself spoken to them in regard to the matter.

Mr. LOGAN. I am anxious about it, for I am receiving a great many letters of inquiry in reference to the measure, and I do not want to have it understood that it is my fault that the bill does not come before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. It is not the Senator's fault, but the fault of the general pressure of business rather than anything else.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 3d instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 231) granting a pension to Jennette S. Kent;

An act (S. 283) granting a pension to Isaac N. Minshall;

An act (S. 813) granting a pension to Miss Rebecca Miller; and

An act (S. 1487) to establish two additional land districts in the State of Nebraska.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CAMDEN, in section 4, line 5, after the word "direction," to strike out "and from the same original point of departure;" so as to make the clause read:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment?

Mr. BECK. That amendment has been debated very largely, and there are not many Senators present now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending amendment.

Mr. BECK. It seems to me that before the vote is taken upon that important subject, which is perhaps the most important in the bill, a little more notice ought to be given to the Senate in order to have it a little fuller than it is now. The Senator from Illinois will see the propriety of my suggestion. Can not the bill be proceeded with until the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] comes in, and defer action on the amendment until that time.

Mr. CULLOM. I have the impression that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] desires to address the Senate on this particular subject.

Mr. BECK. I hope that may be done now.

Mr. CULLOM. If he is prepared to proceed now, so far as I am concerned, I should like to hear him; and if not, we shall pass over the amendment until the mover of it comes in.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if I need an apology for addressing the Senate in opposition to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia it must be found in the great popular interest which invests this subject, and in my sincere belief that the amendment is vicious in principle and strikes peculiarly at the welfare of the producers of the West. The importance of the subject can not be overestimated or overstated. The bill is a proposition to regulate commerce among the several States. This commerce is in a large sense the strength and prosperity of our people. Perhaps the growth of this country is not in any way more clearly traceable than in the development of our railway system. When we remember that in 1830 there were only 23 miles of railway in operation in the United States and that to-day there are 126,000 miles, a little over one-fourth of the railway mileage of the entire habitable globe, and that most of the railway corporations are incorporated by States and exist under State laws, we see at once something of the magnitude of the subject and of the difficulty of properly treating it.

That the railway carrier has been and will continue to be a prime factor in the growth and prosperity of the country, and in a substantial sense necessary to our comfort and happiness as a people none will deny. We hear much nowadays, in an undiscriminating way, of past railway consolidations. Excluding the consolidation of competing lines which, in whatever guise accomplished, is a crime against the people; the consolidations of the past have not been an evil. The development of our railway system, which to-day is the model of the world, brought inevitably under the operation of natural laws consolidation of capital and franchises. It was natural that short lines of railway should be brought in this wise into long lines under strong management. And it has been in the public interest that the short lines of railway in the hands of weak and struggling corporations have given way, through consolidation in different forms, to the long lines of to-day under strong central management. Such consolidation has made possible the through bill of lading, has given to the country efficient railway service from State to State and from ocean to ocean, and has been and is to-day a popular benefit.

But the railway corporations of the United States, mostly created as I have said by the States, clothed by State Legislatures with generous franchises and almost with unlimited power, holding in their grasp practically the absolute dominion over the commerce of the States, sheltering themselves for very many years, as they supposed they might, behind the Dartmouth College decision, thinking they were beyond the reach of the people and above the reach of legislative interference, as they grew in strength grew in tyranny, until it became necessary for the Legislatures of many States, in self-defense, to lay the heavy hand of the law upon them, not to cripple them in the exercise of the great functions with which they were clothed, but to teach them that in an essential sense they were a public instrumentality and must consult and subserve the public interest.

So it has come about that in at least twenty-six States of this Union (and I wonder that there are any exceptions) there is railroad legislation guarding against discriminations and, as far as may be, against injustice upon the part of railway corporations to the people. That such legislation in all the States has been productive of great good, I think no man representing any of those States will deny.

But under the Constitution of the United States, as every one knows, the States could not regulate these corporations or control them except as to traffic confined within the borders of the State. Traffic from one State to another State was entirely beyond the reach of State legislation. So that the railway corporations, nearly all of which are engaged in interstate commerce, were bound by law only as to purely State traffic, and they have been left to their own sweet will as to the great volume of the traffic from State to State.

It is not open to dispute that the people of the country, realizing the wonderful growth of these corporations and their almost limitless power to-day over "the commerce among the several States," long weary of tolerating evils which have grown up unchecked, demand of Congress that it shall exercise the power vested in it by the Constitution, and beyond the jurisdiction of the States, by the enactment of some law which shall place under control and fair regulation the railway corporations engaged in such commerce.

Many Legislatures, I think, have invoked by memorial the exercise of this power, and both of the great political parties are in the most solemn way committed to it.

The limits within which Congress may constitutionally act are quite well settled, and I venture to assert that the failure of this Congress to act upon the subject would arouse popular disappointment and indignation. The people have not, however, as I understand it, demanded any specific measure. They fully appreciate the difficulties which environ the subject, and which render, in the very nature of things, the exercise of this great power at the outset tentative and experimental. It can not be expected, keeping in view the multiplicity, almost infinite, of combinations and conditions and elements and vicissitudes and interests which surround and enter into the transportation question, that there should come from this Congress an interstate-commerce law perfect in its scope and detail, nor do the people expect us to come to this subject with curses upon our lips or bitterness in our hearts.

The popular demand has in it no element of unfriendliness to the railway carriers of the country, nor any desire to oppress or harass them. They are too useful and too necessary for that; but the demand is, and it is a just demand, which must be heeded, that the calmest and best thought of Congress shall be given to the enactment of a law in which shall be plainly formulated the general principles clearly essential to the public protection, with elastic provisions as to detail, so that the law, while protecting against unjust discrimination, shall not itself unjustly discriminate.

I have read with great care the report of the committee charged by Congress with investigation of this subject. I can not doubt that the country will appreciate the great labor and patience and ability with which the committee has conducted the investigation, and the distinguished chairman of the committee may well be proud that the measure formulated and reported by his committee bears his name, for, except that I doubt the wisdom of section 4, the bill, as a whole, has my hearty support.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] proposes by his amendment to incorporate in this bill, as I understand it, what is substantially a provision that under no circumstances shall the railway carrier engaged in interstate commerce charge more for a short haul than for a long haul on the same line and in the same direction. I do not doubt in the slightest his sincerity in proposing this amendment, or that he believes its enactment into law would subserve the general interest, but I feel bound to say that in my judgment it would be a grave mistake for Congress to embody it in any law passed upon the subject.

I do not doubt the existence of the evils of which the Senator complains and of which other Senators complain. I do not suppose there is a member of this body who does not know of instances of gross discrimination by railway carriers, and it would be somewhat strange if it were otherwise, but I think without the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, either in the form in which he has proposed it, or in any form, the bill, fairly considered, contains provisions which will, if properly enforced, afford reasonable safeguards to the people and constitute an efficient corrective of the evils complained of. I think the discussion elicited by the long-haul short-haul proposition has led Senators to underestimate the strength and importance of the general provisions of the bill.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] the other day, speaking of the general clauses of the bill to which the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] referred, ridiculed them as "general-utility" clauses of little or no significance. Let me read two of the sections of the bill. The first one is this:

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of such property, shall be reasonable and just.

I desire, in passing, to suggest to the chairman of the committee whether this language does not need amendment in order to bring a violation of it within the penal section of the bill. Section 7, which is the penal section, imposes the penalty only against the doing, &c., of "acts, matters, and things in this act declared to be unlawful." This being a penal section its language would doubtless be strictly construed, and as a violation of the clause requiring just and reasonable charges, before read, is not in terms "declared to be unlawful," it is doubtful whether such a violation by a railway carrier, even if willful, would be held to subject the carrier to criminal prosecution. I therefore suggest, in order to bring it beyond any possible question within the scope of the penal section, and to punish by criminal prosecution willful violation, the addition of the words "and any unjust or unreasonable charge for any such service is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful."

Mr. CULLOM. I shall not take the time to explain at present the reason why the bill is in the shape it is, as indicated by the Senator, but I will do so after the Senator has concluded his remarks, and will then submit the amendment to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest that amendment to the Senator and will offer it hereafter. In connection with the provision which I first read requiring charges to be just and reasonable, I desire to call attention to section 3, which provides—

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Now I ask the Senator from West Virginia whether the clause against extortion and this section 3 which prohibits any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage as between persons, firms, localities, and different kinds of traffic will not, if enforced, bring into the law a shield against the discrimination, extortion, and injustice to which he and others refer which would in all human probability upon fair trial be found adequate?

I know that this bill does not add in these respects to the common-law duty of the carrier upon the subject, and I believe I may say, confidently expecting the approval of Senators, that the common-law duty and liability of the carrier, if rigidly enforced in this country, would be found ample protection to the people against extortion and unjust discrimination of every kind by common carriers.

Mr. CAMDEN. When you are ready I desire to answer the interrogatory.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CAMDEN. By the express provisions of the fourth section you legalize the right of the railroad to charge more for a shorter haul than a longer haul by the limitation. The provision is:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction—

You then limit it by saying—and from the same original point of departure.

There you give the express authority to this commission to limit it, and the commission is bound under the act to limit it from the same point of departure, and can not exercise the discretion mentioned by the Senator to extend it to other points. You limit it there, and you expressly provide for discrimination for a shorter over a longer haul.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator misapprehends my question, and therefore does not answer it. The proposition which I make is that the clauses I have read, although nothing more than declaratory of the common law, will, if rigidly enforced, guard against almost every conceivable just complaint to which the Senator from West Virginia alludes.

Mr. CAMDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CAMDEN. If the Senator is willing that these discriminations shall be provided for and claims that they are provided for in the bill, why does he object to making it plain and simple by allowing the provision to be inserted in the fourth section?

Mr. SPOONER. I will come to that. The Senator does not apprehend my position. I freely admit that in this country the common-law duty of the carrier has been greatly disregarded. I admit that the enactment by Legislature after Legislature of the common law upon the subject, but leaving to the aggrieved citizen the duty of vindicating in the courts his common-law rights, has been utterly futile as a shield against wrong by the carrier.

And if the committee had been content with simply incorporating in the bill, as they have done in very perfect language, the safeguards which the common law throws around the shipper, you might as well write the words of these clauses in the sand, within the tide line, expecting to find them there next year, as to write them in the statute expecting them to be any protection to the citizen; or, as Rufus Choate once beautifully said in this Chamber, "You were as wisely employed in writing them upon the clouds of the summer evening's western sky, in the dream of seeing them carried around the world in the train of the next day's sun, as to write them in a statute depending upon their enforcement at the suit of the citizen who is injured by their violation."

The explanation of the utter inefficiency of the common-law duty and liability of the carrier as a protection to the people is familiar to every Senator. The grievances of the individual shipper are as a rule, each considered by itself, trifling in amount, and the citizen has in almost every instance been reluctant to engage in a litigation with a railway corporation to vindicate, for so small a sum, his rights under the common law or under statutes simply declaratory of the common law. Under the practice laws of the States the railway corporations have been enabled, and they have not been slow to avail themselves of the right, to protract such litigation by continuances, appeals, and otherwise, thereby rendering it burdensome and expensive. The sum involved being small, even success at the end of a long litigation was to the complainant defeat.

There has been another reason more potent still: Few shippers have dared to venture upon a litigation with a railway corporation in order to invoke in the courts the common-law protection. Why? Because the railway company, through its freight agents, through its system of rebates, through its power of discrimination, through its absolute dominion over the business of a place and over the business of its people, has had it in it its power—I will venture to say sometimes exercised—to visit condign and swift punishment upon men who dared to invoke the protection of the courts to secure them in the enjoyment of the rights vouchsafed by the common law or statutes merely declaratory. Not only because of the expense, not only because of the delay, but because of their absolute fear of ruin in their business by favoritism, by discrimination in numberless ways, few men have dared to embark in that litigation with a railway company.

Under such circumstances it is not surprising, and the fact has been within the observation of every Senator, that in the great mass of instances the common-law remedy of the citizen has been unavailing, and the carrier has gone exempt from the performance of its common-law duty. So that if these clauses stood alone in the bill, apart from the peculiar provisions for their enforcement, I should not hesitate to denounce them as idle words. But the bill goes beyond that. The bill puts strength and virility into the common-law principles for the protection of the shipper. How? It puts the whole strength and power of the United States behind them.

It provides that any man and any community whose rights are trenched upon by the violation of either of these provisions may complain to the board of commissioners. It is made the duty of the commissioners to investigate it, upon notice to the railway company guilty of the alleged violation of law. It is made the duty of the commission to make a report upon it, to give to the complainants a copy of that report, to notify the railway company, which must comply with the decision of the commission within a certain time, and if the railway company is recalcitrant, unwilling to yield obedience to the decision of the commission, what then? The citizen whose rights have been trenched upon is not remitted to his common-law remedy—he is not told to bring his litigation in the courts; not at all; but the decision of the commissioners arrived at upon a thorough investigation, with plenary power to examine witnesses and to look at the records and papers of the company bearing upon the question, is sent to the district attorney of the United States. No matter whether it be a case of extortion, of unjust charges at a local station, or of discrimination against a local station, whether in favor of a competitive point or otherwise, it is made the duty of the district attorney to commence the suit against the offending railway company.

Not only that, but the burden of proof is changed by this law, and I think it is wisely changed. The bill provides that the report of the commission shall be prima facie evidence against the railway company and in favor of the shipper who has made the complaint. The bill goes beyond that in providing for the enforcement by the Government of the United States of the common-law duty of the carrier. It provides that if the railway company is defeated it shall pay the costs of the prosecution, including the witness fees, the costs of the complainant, and the fee to the district attorney, and if perchance the railway company should be successful, the United States pays the expense of the suit. The shipper whose common-law right is thus sought to be vindicated by the Government of the United States under the bill is not in any contingency obliged to put into operation the machinery of the law except by complaining to the commission, or obliged in any contingency to pay the expense of the litigation.

Do you tell me that the common-law provisions incorporated in the bill, backed by the power of the Government, relieving the citizen from the responsibility of litigation and from its cost, constitute no shield against extortion and discrimination? If incorporated into law it will be a new feature of the law of this country. I am not willing yet to believe that a commission created by Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional power, clothed with this great authority, will not be able if they are honest and faithful men, as I have no doubt they will be, to enforce the common-law principles in favor of the shipper and in favor of localities so as to do away as far as it can be done with the discrimination of which my friend from West Virginia complains. It is not fair to the committee, it is not fair to this bill that Senators shall ignore as a means of protection such virile and vigorous provisions of law as are those I have read with the power of the Government behind them. That is not all.

The bill in another section strikes at the root, strikes at the heart of a fruitful source of discrimination and outrage by the carriers of this country, both in State and interstate commerce. I call the attention of the Senate to the language of section 2, and the section is carefully drawn; it seems to me almost perfect in its language:

> That if any common carrier shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered, or to be rendered, in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

Any violation of this prohibition against rebates comes under the penalty section of the bill and in addition to that is given a large claim for damages, which is to be enforced at the expense of the Government and by means of the Government officials to whom I referred a moment ago.

This leaves room for special rates wherever special rates are fair. And every man who knows anything about the transportation business knows that there are circumstances under which special rates are fair and just. That section as it is drawn, to my mind, strikes as perfectly as language can against that great curse of transportation wherever it exists—mere favoritism. Every Senator here knows that it is in the power of railroad corporations, a power sometimes exercised, I think, to build up by favoritism one business at the expense of another in the same community. It is in their power to make one man prosper, and to bring to another man engaged in the same business in the same place ruin.

This provision, if it becomes a law, takes away from the railroad corporation that power of favoritism. I have never yet been able to see any possible, conceivable defense for the exercise by railway companies of such a power. I have never been able to see any reason for inequality in service by railway corporations of people situated in the same community engaged in the same business. There is to my mind no defense for it whatever.

The railway company derives its right to live from the State. It is clothed with peculiar powers. It can run its locomotives along the streets; it can cross the highways; it scatters fire in every direction without any liability, no matter what injury is done, if it only exercises due diligence. It is clothed with the supreme right of the people to take your property at a price to be fixed by some one other than yourself and against your will. It is necessary that railway companies should possess this power, and I think they generally pay for the property they take all that it is worth, and perhaps more than it is worth; but they may take property the value of which to the owner is not reducible to the standard of the dollar.

There is little property that I know of beyond the reach of condemnation by the railway corporations under the laws of the country where it is necessary that they should take it. They may take your home, "the dearest spot on earth" to you, in which center the tenderest memories of your life, around whose hearth brothers and sisters now scattered and gone used to gather, from under whose roof perhaps you carried your father and mother to graves under the tree which he planted and tended in his early manhood. They have a right to take this from you, and they must be clothed with the power of taking it, because otherwise the great public interest could not be subserved.

But, sir, no corporation clothed in the public interest by the public with such powers as these ought to be permitted to use the franchise of the carrier to favor in the distribution of its service persons or firms or locality, or to discriminate against persons or firms or locality. The old formula that "equality is equity" is as wise for the government of the carrier as it is for the guidance of the chancellor. I think this section, drawn as it is against rebates, against special rates, against favoritism, will be one of great practical importance to the people of this country, and will greatly tend to correct the discriminations of which the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] complain.

This power to give rebates and special rates and other discriminative privileges has been, in the hands of the general freight agent and the general manager of the railway corporation, a ready and often-used instrument, ample in various ways, and productive of the rate wars which have been for the last few years almost the rule in this country between contending and competing corporations.

There has been, if I may be permitted to so remark, too much personality or individuality in the railway management of the country. I was told by a distinguished gentleman connected with a great railway, a man whose name is a guarantee for the accuracy and truthfulness of what he says, that within the last few years he knew of an instance where a single remark from a railway president over a glass of wine at a hotel table brought on a war of rates which cost $5,000,000 of revenues before it was ended. No man can calculate the cost and the loss which it brought to shippers and to the people in the region which that railway traversed.

These constant rate wars have brought into the business, as every one who hears me knows, that most dangerous of all elements to business prosperity, the element of uncertainty. No man who has had anything to buy knew what he ought to pay, because he could not know from day to day what the rate of carriage would be. No man who has had anything to sell knew what he ought to ask for it, for he could not know from day to day what the rate of carriage would be. It may easily happen at such a time that two merchants, doing business at the same point, might buy of the same firm, at the same prices, a large stock of goods, one paying the current rate for transporting them to his place of business, the other having the unfair advantage within a fortnight of a rate war, which would enable him to sell his stock at prices which, while giving him a handsome profit, would ruin his neighbor. That is not what can be called healthy competition, no more than the flush of fever is the ruddy glow of health. A condition of affairs which leads great railway corporations to carry freight and passengers for less than it costs is not only destructive to the interests of the stockholders, but is destructive, in a palpable way, of the interests and business of the people.

I think this provision, and the tendency it will have to prevent rate wars, to take it out of the hands of freight agents to cut under each other will tend to the steadiness of rates and to the benefit of the people in every way; will tend to restore what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] some years ago remarked in a speech upon the subject in the Senate as a great railway evil in this country, the decadence of good faith in the compacts as to rates, &c., of railway companies with each other.

There is another section of this bill which provides for publicity of rates. That is new in this country. It provides not only for publicity of rates—and it is a step in the right direction, and a long, strong step, too—but it provides that railroad companies shall not, having published their rates, without notice increase them. Railway companies will be very slow to enter upon rate wars, they will be very slow to bring disorder and uncertainty into the business of the country by reducing their rates below what is right and fair and just to stockholders and to the people, if they are prohibited from putting their rates back again at will.

This committee has stricken out of the bill a provision which was in it when it was first introduced, and which, with a qualification proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], I think should be put back into the bill, and that is that the railroad companies shall not be permitted to lower their rates either without a shorter notice. The qualification to which I refer was that they might lower their rates without notice where it was necessary to meet competition by water or by a carrier not reached by the provisions of this bill and beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal authorities. I think the provision requiring publicity of rates, properly guarded, will be an advantage and a great advantage to the people. It will help the people to know whether rebates and special rates are being allowed in violation of the law. It will stimulate the watchfulness of the people. It will make much more easy of enforcement all the other provisions of this act, and it will, as I said before, tend very strongly to prevent the frequent recurrence of rate wars. Am I wrong in saying that the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Maryland underestimate the value of this provision, together with the other provisions of this bill to which I have referred, as a means of protection against the outrages of which they complain?

Now, sir, some suggestions directly upon the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] and I have done.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], for whom I entertain the profoundest respect in every way, who is one of the few Senators whom I had the honor to know before I became a member of this body, in his remarks the other day on this clause rather seemed to imply that any one who was opposed to this short-haul and long-haul provision must be classified as a railroad representative upon this floor. No man must put me, in my advocacy of this bill or my opposition to this amendment, in that category. Mr. President, I may be wrong about it but I think that the short-haul and long-haul provision, which the Senator from West Virginia is so partial to, would be in the interest of railway companies, and I think it would result in largely increased revenue to railway companies. I am not able to see that it would be unjust to the railway companies of the country in any way after they shall have adapted themselves to it. But I want to say here that if I thought it would be unjust to the railway companies I should not hesitate for one moment, standing here in the United States Senate, to say so. When the time comes, if it ever shall come, that I shall be deterred from saying what I think I ought to say or from doing what I think I ought to do upon any subject pending before the Senate, by the fear that some man here or elsewhere will wrongly charge me with representing an interest upon this floor, other than that of my constituency, I shall give back to my people the trust which they gave into my hands and ask them to place their interests in the care and keeping of some one more manly and more independent.

Sir, I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, and he does not misunderstand its scope, strikes a steady, direct blow at competition all over the United States. I can understand why that Senator and others situated as he is support it, but I fear it strikes at the producer and merchant of the West and at the merchant, the manufacturer, and the consumer of the East. I think it is a proposition to put upon the statute-book a discrimination worse than any which is now complained of as made by railway companies. What is it?

It is a declaration by the Congress of the United States that under no circumstances shall a railway company charge more for a short haul than it charges for a long haul on the same line and in the same direction, subject if you please (but I attach little consequence to that) to a power in these commissioners to unshackle the competitive forces thus chained in spots throughout the country where in their judgment it is advisable.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] never uttered a truer word in all his long and splendid public career than the statement which he made here the other day while favoring this amendment, that it would result in increasing the through or competitive rates. The Senator from West Virginia in the speech, very able and exceedingly frank, which he made the other day, admitted, because he must admit it, the same thing; and no truer prophecy ever was made, in my judgment, than that which you, Mr. President, then made that if the Congress should pass such a provision and so chain the competitive forces engaged in the transportation business of the country, it would bring a demand for its repeal, and that quite speedily, which Congress would not disregard.

Now what is there in this proposition that a railroad company shall not charge more for a short haul than for a long haul which Senators think is so fair? Chicago is often referred to in this discussion. The Senator from West Virginia complained that the rates from local points through West Virginia, between Chicago and tide water, are higher than they are from Chicago to tide water. That is doubtless true. During the season of navigation it is true, and it is often true when the lakes and the canals and rivers are locked and the competition is only by rail. Why ought it not to be true? What right have you at a local station in West Virginia to demand that Chicago shall be deprived by law of the competitive forces which God and nature have given her, or that you shall have the benefit of competition which you do not possess? Chicago is situated upon a lake. She may ship to Buffalo, from Buffalo she has water carriage to tide water; four or five trunk lines of railway run out of Chicago, brought there by the expenditure of millions of dollars, invited there by the expenditure locally of millions of dollars, for what?

In order to give Chicago, one of the great gateways through which the West has been for years pouring her wealth to the Atlantic seaboard, the benefit of competition. The position of Milwaukee is similar. This question is discussed here from the beginning as if the railway companies, of their own motion, out of favoritism to Chicago and other competitive points, made low through rates. Is that true? We all know, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] very truthfully said the other day, that rail transportation can not compete with transportation by water. When navigation is open from Chicago to tide water the railway companies carrying freight from Chicago to New York have no more to do with fixing the through rate than I have with fixing the income which the Senator from West Virginia shall receive from his investments. In order to carry at all, they must bring their rates down to the lowest point for which another will carry; and when navigation is open, whether by lake, by canal, or by river, the railway companies have to bring rates down low, very low in order to carry through freight at all, because a rate which is ruinously low to the railroad carrier affords a handsome profit to the carrier by water.

The conditions of water transportation, as to cost, &c., are essentially different to that by rail. The river and the lake are natural highways, free to all; they are highways furnished ready-made, free of cost, for the use and benefit of all. No cost of maintenance or repair rests upon any one as a condition of such use. If the river needs improvement, or the harbor on the lake, the necessary expenditure is made by the general public.

Now tell me, pray, what philosophy or reason there is, as a matter of principle, for declaring that because the railway carrier from Chicago to tide water in the East is obliged to meet a rate which is made by the vessel, and therefore to give a low rate through to the ocean, that those who live at a station fifty or a hundred miles out from Chicago, situated on only one railroad line, shall have the benefit of that competition? It is an attempt to take away from communities and from people natural advantages which they have, and advantages which they have acquired and paid for, under the supposition that it will tend to give advantages to other points to which, in my judgment, they are not entitled.

Mind you, I do not attempt to justify on the part of any railway company exorbitant and unfair rates from local points. I do not attempt to justify charges upon the part of a railroad company from local and non-competing stations which are made with sole reference to enable them to recoup and make up from such localities what they fail to get because of the competition at other points. I think this bill will, if enforced, prevent extortion; but what I assert is this, that situated on one line of railway only, without any lake, without any river, without any competition, you have no right to complain that you have not the same competition that Chicago and other points differently situated have, nor have you a right to demand by operation of law the benefit of competitive prices which nature has denied you, and which you have not possessed either the power or the enterprise to acquire. Railway companies meet at Chicago a rate made by water. It is too low, if you please. It is not too low because they want it to be low. It is not voluntarily made too low to enable them to make money by discriminating against local points, for railway companies want to get from competing points as well as from local stations all the traffic they can and the highest rates they can, but the through rate is made low because of the competition, it is made low because the river and the lake will carry the freight if the railway carrier does not, and it is low because it must meet that rate or not take it all.

Now, this proposition that a railway company shall not charge more for a short haul than for a long haul, is to do what? It is to say that a station 50 miles this side of Chicago which has but one railway, which has no transportation by water, which has no competitive forces whatever, shall have precisely the benefit of the competitive forces that Chicago has, that Milwaukee has, that Omaha has, that certain points in Kansas have, that Saint Louis has, that Kansas City has, that Saint Paul has, that Minneapolis has. Is there any justice in that? To my mind it is a species of communism; it is an attempt to take from those who have competition that which they have and to give it to those who have it not and who, by the operation of natural laws, are not entitled to it. It is an attempt by this amendment to provide what? To provide that the maximum rate—and Senators say it is not a bill relating to rates at all—from local and non-competing stations shall be the competitive rate from the competing point. The West never could have been built up but for the competition which has brought it near to tide water.

It has been considered a desirable thing to the whole country that the frontier should be pushed rapidly farther and farther to the westward. To that end, by the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars brought here from the Old World and from the New England States, as well as that contributed by the West and by the localities to be immediately benefited, hundreds and thousands of miles of railroads have been constructed. What for, if not to bring nearer to the markets of the East and to export facilities those distant regions and their products? How could this result if the mileage basis of freights is to be applied?

Natural advantages are pretty well distributed after all. We have been brought by this immense expenditure of money nearer to the tide-water. We have abundance of water competition, and our lands are more easily tilled and cost less money than lands in West Virginia probably. But the Senator from West Virginia must not forget that his constituents have advantages over us. Our people occupy the boundless prairies, and are far from fuel, which comes to them at great cost, and are far from manufacturing centers, while West Virginia—and this is true of many of the other States—has wood and coal and iron and manufactures in abundance and at hand.

Mr. President, I admit the difficulty of the subject. I do not claim to absolutely know that I am right about it; I have great faith in the opinions of the Senator from West Virginia; but if I can reason upon this subject, it is a proposition which, while it will injure the West, while it will destroy the competitive forces which we have there and to which we are entitled, while it will destroy largely the export business of the country and will injure the merchants and manufacturers and business of the East, it will not benefit the people who are so strenuous in favor of the adoption of this amendment.

I want to ask the Senator from West Virginia what percentage of the business of the Pennsylvania Railway Company, to which he referred the other day, is its through business?

Mr. CAMDEN. Ten per cent.

Mr. SPOONER. Ten per cent. Now, look at that a moment. Ten per cent. of the business of the Pennsylvania Railway Company is its through business, which you say is done at a low rate, affording very slight profit. Ninety per cent. of its business is local business, 90 per cent. of it is the business which gives life and strength and power and wealth to the Pennsylvania Railway Company. Now, if you provide that the Pennsylvania Railway Company shall, if it takes business at the low through rate which is necessary from Chicago, correspondingly reduce its local rates between New York and Chicago; if you say to the Pennsylvania Railway Company "the maximum rate from all your local stations between Chicago and the seaboard shall be this competitive rate fixed at Chicago," what will the Pennsylvania Railway Company do? It would not hesitate one moment as to what it would do. No man of sense could hesitate for a moment as to what it should do.

It would simply no longer meet that competitive rate. It would not give away 90 per cent. of its business, the business upon which it relied to pay its interest and keep its road-bed in repair and keep its rolling-stock in condition and in good supply—it would not give away that business.

Mr. CAMDEN. It does not do it now. It has established the long and short haul principle.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know about that. I do not know what rebates that company is giving. I do not know anything about the inside history of its transactions; but I do know this, I think, that if the Congress of the United States says to the Pennsylvania Railway Company "whatever rates you put upon this 10 per cent. of through business, which you take in competition with the lake and the river and the canal during the season of navigation, will be the utmost limit of your local charges," the Pennsylvania Railway Company would not hesitate one moment to say that it would rather sacrifice the 10 per cent. through business than lower their local rates.

Would they hesitate to say it? It can not be possible. The result would simply be this: They would put up their through rates. They would not get the freight, of course, but they would rather throw away that 10 per cent. of business which they carry at trifling profit, if any, than to sacrifice one single farthing of their local rates between Chicago and the seaboard. That is what they would do. That is what the Lake Shore would do. That is what those two competing lines would do, and what other roads would do throughout the country where such competition exists. They would say to the carriers by water, "Take this freight at your price until navigation closes and our turn comes. We will not throw away our local freights in order to be able to carry this small percentage of our business for little or nothing from Chicago and Milwaukee and Omaha and the other competitive points of the West to tide water."

Then what will come about? Do you think they will then lower the local rates? Not at all. They would have lost what little business they had on the through freights, and they would feel just that much less inclined to lose anything on the local rates. They would put up the through rates and they would not lower the local rates a cent. On the contrary, they would be likely to raise them, and they could do it with impunity, keeping up the through rates, for the local rates of the country are as a rule high only by comparison with the through rate. If they charged too much for carrying from a local station, you would make your complaint to the commissioners, under this bill, that they were discriminating against you, that they were perpetrating extortion upon you, and seek a remedy here; but you would not get any reduction of local rates, it seems to me, by the railway company by reason of your having destroyed their business from competitive points.

But that is not all. What else would result? While it would not benefit these local stations at all it would injure the West and the East (for the low through rates are from east to west as well as from west to east), because it is with the carriers by lake and river as it is with the carriers by rail; they get the highest price they can, and if the railroads are not longer obliged to compete with the river and lake and canal, if that transportation belongs entirely to the water, the water rates will go up and they will stay up as long as navigation lasts; and when navigation is closed, what then? You can not pool very well the business of the railway carriers with the business of the steamboat and vessel men, because the water is free as air, and the interests are diverse, the ownerships are not brought together; but the very moment navigation closes, the very moment you can not carry by water any longer, the very moment the interests of the country are dependent upon rail transportation, and the farmers of the West will have to send by rail or not at all, then the merchants of the West who want their goods from New York, from Baltimore (if Baltimore wants any more of our products or any more of our trade), must rely solely upon the railway carriers. Under such a law as this, which lays upon the railway carriers a command to keep up their through rates under penalty of reducing their local rates upon which they rely for their life, they will be forced to combine, to consolidate, and to keep up the through rates lest their local rates suffer.

Sir, experience may lead me to a different conclusion; further investigation by competent men bent upon arriving at a correct result, laid before Congress, may lead us all to a different conclusion; but for the life of me I can not see any other effect from this short-haul and long-haul provision which the Senator from West Virginia and some of his friends seek to ingraft upon the bill than that it shall stifle the competitive forces of the country, and that not for the benefit either of local points.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask one question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator does not deny or affirm that a charge twice as much for half the distance on the same road is either right or wrong, or that this bill in its further provisions would affect it in any way. That he leaves untouched. But the Senator dissuades me from voting for this amendment by saying that these great monopolies have the power to increase the proportion between the short and the long haul to the disadvantage of local points, and that because they have this terrible monopoly of power it is best to succumb to it and yield to it for fear of something worse. Now if I understand his argument, that is it; and if it is different I should like to have it settled.

Mr. SPOONER. My argument is this: I do not claim that it is fair to charge twice as much for half the distance if you state that abstract proposition; I claim no such thing; but I claim that if the railway company, in the case you put the other day, is perpetrating an outrage upon the people of Michigan, under this bill if it becomes a law it will rest in the power of the commission to bring the company "to book." I claim that without the short haul and long haul provision it will be, upon complaint, in the power of the commissioners, and their duty, to decide against the company. It will be the duty of the district court of the United States, at the expense of the company or the United States, to pursue, upon their report and decision, a remedy for the citizen or the community; and under this bill, if the railway company persists in doing injustice, exemplary damages are allowed and provided for, and in addition to that, having regard for the large public interest added to the individual interest complaining, if the railway company still persists, then, as of course, the arm of the Federal courts by injunction preventive or mandatory is laid upon them to right the wrong.

The argument which I have made, or at least which I have intended to make plain to the Senate, is that a fair trial of this bill, with all its safeguards and all its penalties, with its elasticity of detail, will enable the commissioners to guard against the evils which are complained of, and that there is no necessity for resort to this long-haul, short-haul experiment which may be so fatal in its injurious effects. Time, I say, may show that I am mistaken in this; but I am afraid now with the information before us to adopt as a corrective a provision which, in my mind, will put up the through rates and stifle the competition of the country. Detroit has the benefit of competition, Detroit is entitled to the benefit of competition to the tide-water and from the tide-water to the West. A large part of Michigan tributary to Detroit has that benefit too. Until the provisions of this bill have been fairly tried, until these commissioners have investigated and reported, until we know something more about it and its probable effect, I am not willing myself to vote for a proposition which, while to my mind it will not remedy the evils complained of, will inflict upon the country others which are far greater.

I do not say, mind you, that there are not all through Michigan, as I know there are doubtless in my State, some outrages upon the part of carriers that ought to be remedied; but I think I see that a wise and honest and strong enforcement of this bill, if it shall become a law, will enable us to remedy those wrongs without striking down by this provision——

Mr. CONGER. Let me ask in that same connection a question.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. I admire the candid manner in which my friend treats this subject. I alluded in my remarks to actual existing cases in Michigan, and I did that without referring to some other cases in other States, because the State of Michigan, two peninsulas as it is, almost surrounded by water, has access to water communication very direct from all its interior to the East, to the West, to the North, and almost to the South. Now, the statement which I made was in regard to charging so much more for carrying flour to the East from points in Michigan than would be charged from Chicago; that it was the interest of the millers in Michigan having access at reasonable distances to the water around it to pay freight clear back 100 miles to Chicago and then get contracts over the same roads to carry their flour to the Eastern market.

If there is that hardship in a State surrounded by water as Michigan is, what may it not be in States which have no such water communication—States like West Virginia, States like Ohio and Indiana? If, with all our water advantages—we are wonderfully situated in that respect—there can be such great impositions upon the producers of the grain and the flour of Michigan, what must not the disadvantages be in States that have no such easy competition?

Mr. SPOONER. Why, Mr. President, I have not in anything that I have said attempted to defend the discrimination of which the Senator complains. I do not know what the precise facts are in that case. I do not know what governs the railway companies in their action. If I understand the statement, I have no hesitation in saying to him that upon its face it seems like an unjust discrimination which ought to be prevented. I have no doubt that there are similar ones in every State in this Union. I do not deny that. I justify the passage of this bill; as one of the representatives of the people, I demand the passage of some such bill in order to guard against unjust discrimination everywhere; but my proposition is simply this: that we ought not to strike down the competing points and tributary sections throughout the land in order to protect—for I think it would not protect—these local points. I deny the efficacy and the justice of the proposed remedy. If the charge from the local points is an unreasonable charge, then this commission, as I have tried to show, will have the power to lay its hand upon it and to apply a corrective. The proposition which I make is that we can remedy that; at any rate we ought to remedy that without resorting to this short-haul provision, which I believe attempts to give to a single station this side of Detroit all the competition by water and rail that Detroit has, that attempts to equalize along every railway of the country by legislation advantages and disadvantages, natural and acquired.

I am very far wrong if this bill without this short and long haul provision would not enable the commission to reach the grievance of which the Senator from Michigan complains. Of course, as far as these discriminations are local to a State, its Legislature may apply efficient regulation.

Mr. CAMDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question now?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CAMDEN. In reference to the disadvantages the farmer of the West is placed under by this amendment let me take the case of Ohio, which produces about 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, or the State of Indiana, which produces something more, or the State of Illinois, about the same, or West Virginia, four or five million bushels and a larger proportion of live-stock.

I want to ask the Senator what hardship it is on the States west of the Mississippi if they are limited to getting their products to the seaboard market at the same price that the East pays between the seaboard market and the place of production? In other words, is it not liberal and fair to the Western States if they are permitted by legislation to get their products to the sea-board market at the same price as the great Middle and Western States lying between the seaboard and the Mississippi River? Is there any discrimination against the West, is there any hardship against the West by the enactment of this provision which leaves to the commission a discretionary power to vary the rules where it is necessary to secure the proper rights of the railroad and also to equalize different sections of the country? Can there be any hardship to the West in that, and is it not a liberal provision in favor of the West?

Mr. SPOONER. If I understand the question of the Senator from West Virginia, he is simply arguing in a circle. That is the very question which I have attempted to discuss from the beginning. Our people get their low through rates, if you please, from Chicago; they pay their share of a fair local rate to the competing point before they have the advantage and benefit of the through rate; and the question is not so much whether we are charged too little as it is whether you are charged too much. We are entitled to all the benefit that competition gives us, if at Chicago, if at Milwaukee, if at Saint Paul, if at Duluth, if at Kansas City, if at Saint Louis, if at Omaha, if at the other competitive points west of Chicago we have the benefit of rivers and of competing lines of railway which you have not at Parkersburg.

Mr. CAMDEN. I ask the Senator, do we take any of these competing advantages? Are not the water ways left there, and the water ways always secure competition? Are not the competing railways left? Are not the shippers left at perfect liberty to avail themselves of the natural water ways and the natural competition?

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all. That is what is complained of, that you do strike down our competition, that you do attempt to take away from us advantages which we are entitled to, because you admit yourself that the through business for the trunk-line railroads is a trifle. You admit yourself that that business they carry for trifling pay. You admit yourselves that it is of no consequence to them in the great volume of their revenue. Now, can anything be plainer, that being true, than that if you say to those railroad companies, "Look to the rates you give the West; we are watching you, and if you give to the farmers of the West, the grain-growers of the West, the cattle-dealers of the West, a lower rate, notwithstanding all this competition at different points, notwithstanding the fact that the water makes the rate and not the railroad, if you give them this low rate, you must correspondingly reduce your rates from all the local stations between Chicago and the seaboard," the through rates go up, and up to stay? Can anything be plainer that this kills the competition both by water and rail?

Mr. CAMDEN. I do not want to interrupt too often, but right in that connection I wish to make a suggestion. Suppose there is a reduction on wheat or live-stock or any agricultural product from Chicago, is there any fairness in allowing the States west of the Mississippi to sell wheat in the market at 5 cents a bushel below what it can be sold for in Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia, or Illinois? You are discriminating against those sections of the country. You are enacting a law that that shall be lawful, and this commission can not go behind it; and if they can not, whenever complaint is made of undue discriminations to the commission you have an answer right in the words of the statute which has authorized the action.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from West Virginia is arguing a question which I have not yet come to. My proposition is this, and it seems to me too plain almost for discussion: The farmers of the West are entitled to just what you are entitled to, the benefits and the advantages that their situation gives them. If they are so located that competing forces at work give them a lower rate, whether by rail or by water, that is their advantage under the providence of God, and it is not your disadvantage. It is not a discrimination made by railway companies against you; it is a discrimination arising from the situation.

Mr. CAMDEN. I wish to ask one question, and then I shall not trouble the Senator again. He says the Western farmer gets his produce to market by rail one-half of the year. Now why should you so provide as to give a cheaper rate to the Western farmer west of Chicago than is given to the farmer living in Ohio? And why should we by a bill discriminate against the bulk of the farmers of this country in favor of 15 or 20 per cent. who are better located, and enable them to bring their products to market at a cheaper rate?

Mr. SPOONER. That is the same old question.

Mr. CAMDEN. That is the point that my friend can not answer. The proposition can not be answered.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a proposition that I think can be answered; it is a proposition which seems to me to need no answer. I say again, and I am sorry to have to repeat it, that if the local rates are too high, if the railway company charges you from your local and non-competitive station more than a fair equivalent for the service which it renders, then it is guilty of extortion. Your community has the right to complain under this bill, and the bill affords, through the instrumentalities of the Federal courts, without the expenditure of a dollar by your people or by your community, a remedy.

But I have attempted to argue that while the amendment you offer, and upon which you insist, will put up the through rates, it will not reduce the local rates. I do not want, nor does any man in the West want you to pay more than you ought to pay for carrying your freights. We have no interest under heaven in any discrimination against you; we have no interest in crippling your business; we have no interest (indeed our interest is the other way) in any legislation which shall discriminate against you. All we say is, that you have no right to legislation which shall discriminate against us. All we say is, that you must submit to the disadvantage of your location. You live nearer the sea. If you ought to have lower rates than you get through all this competition, make your complaint and get them, or build your competing roads and get them; but pray can you not discover some remedy to protect you against extortionate local rates without objecting to our having low through rates any more at competing points? We insist that you shall try.

Why, Mr. President, for years railway rates, local as well as through, have been going down, down throughout the country. This fact is illustrated by the railroad commissioners of Iowa, who, in their report for 1881, occupy forty-six pages with tables and statements showing the reductions in rates in that State, and in which they particularly call attention to the fact that "the reduction is not confined to the through traffic; it applies, in a somewhat smaller ratio, it is true, to the local traffic as well." (Page 7.) And they conclude their remarks upon the subject as follows:

> We venture to say that this average percentage of reduction for the last fifteen consecutive years will be a matter of no little surprise to everybody who does not make the study of freight tariffs a somewhat regular habit. Although we have made no calculation to demonstrate it, we venture to affirm that an equal average reduction in the cost of any kind of service for which the people pay a money consideration can not be found during the past fifteen years.

I quote from an able article on railway rates by Mr. G. T. Lansing, in the Popular Science Monthly for April, 1886. The fact is further illustrated by some statistics of Mr. Edward Atkinson as to the business done by the New York Central Railway Company within the last few years. He says the tons moved one mile on the New York Central and Hudson River railroad increased from 1865 to 1885 570 per cent.; that the charge per ton per mile on this line was 408 per cent. higher in 1865 than in 1885, and that the profits for moving one ton of freight on this line was 552 per cent. greater in 1865 than in 1885.

But I can not make this proposition any plainer than I have attempted, though under great disadvantage, to make it. I beg leave to suggest that the condition of this country, of its commerce and business, to-day is not quite favorable for the experiment upon it which the Senator from West Virginia proposes. The commerce of the country to-day is suffering tremendous depression. Everything that is sold is sold on a narrow margin of profit. It is a bad time to introduce into the business of the country such an element as this. It is an inauspicious time to attack New York, and Baltimore, and Boston, and Philadelphia, and Chicago, and Milwaukee, and Detroit, and Saint Paul, and Omaha, and Kansas City, and the thousands of other competitive points in this country.

The farmers of the West are meeting on everything they produce a competition which is almost intolerable. They meet it in their dairy products. They are brought into competition with the imitations of butter, having a tremendous sale, which have already made an almost disastrous impression upon the legitimate dairy business of the West, and to some extent of the East. They can not stand any addition to through freights.

Take the tobacco of which Wisconsin raised $5,000,000 worth last year in value, and the competition under our tariff classification as it is to-day with Sumatra tobacco lays almost an embargo upon that industry. I think I may appeal to the Senator from New Jersey that this competition operates to his vast detriment, though he raises his tobacco within sight of the sea. Our farmers can not stand an added price for transportation from the West to the East. Corn and some other products must rot in the field and granary if they are taxed much for transportation. You take the item of wheat. How will the wheat farmer live if compelled to pay higher freights upon his surplus wheat? It does not come out of the middleman; it comes out of the farmer. I need not say here that the farmers of the West can not endure higher freight rates on their wheat to tide water.

The competition which meets the American wheat-grower is now all that this interest can endure. It is worth remembering in this connection that England is doing her utmost—and everything almost is within reach of accomplishment when England does her utmost—England is doing her utmost to drive American wheat from the markets of the world. The competition with Indian wheat is such that the farmers of the West can not bear one penny added to the cost of the transportation of their surplus product to the seaboard any more than your merchant in the East and your manufacturer in the East can stand it to have an addition made to the cost of transportation from your market to our Western prairies or than your consumer can afford to pay higher for what he buys of our products to eat.

I have some figures from a report about to be presented to the Senate by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], which I beg leave to say will be found to be of great value for accuracy, research, and ability, and I invite the attention of those Senators who are so willing to strike down the Western wheat-grower to these figures, showing that for thirteen years ending in 1872 1,000,000 bushels of wheat were sent from India to the United Kingdom, which was our best market, and for the thirteen years ending in 1885 122,000,000 bushels. During those years India changed her position or rather England changed India's position from thirteenth to fourth in the order of wheat-exporting countries. The other day I picked up the report of the Department of Agriculture for April and I find in it, what will surprise no man, this statement:

Steps are being taken to ship Indian wheat in a better state of cleanliness than heretofore, which are expected to increase the value by from 5 to 7 per cent. Much improvement has been made in this regard since the first introduction of Indian wheat into English markets; nevertheless it is estimated that in the last export season 30,000 tons of dirt and foreign matter were carried to the seaboard and, in part, exported abroad.

A steady, constant, powerful effort is being made to develop that industry, to improve the grade of wheat, and to put the Indian wheat-grower where the American wheat-grower has been.

A scheme has been floated in London, through the instrumentality, it is said, of the secretary of state for India, Lord Randolph Churchill, by which the directors of the Great Indian Peninsula Railroad will be enabled to extend their system via Bhopal to Gwalior, Agra, and Cawnpore, in the Indian midland. This plan has long been advocated by the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, and when completed (in five years, according to the calculation) is expected to exert a most important influence on trade, as it shortens the distance to Cawnpore by 134 miles and opens up some of the finest wheat and seed lands in India.

The rates for carrying in this country have gone down for the last few years, as I have said, but I tell the Senator from West Virginia they have not gone down as much as they have from the Indian wheat ports to Liverpool. I find in this report made by my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] certain statistics as to freight rates from Calcutta. The rate per bushel in 1874 was 32.6 cents, the rate in 1885 was 18.1 cents; from Kurrachee it was in 1874 39.8 cents, now it is 16.7 cents; from Bombay in 1880 it was 32.5 cents, and now it is 16.2 cents. From Russia, which has entered the lists, from the Black Sea it was 19.4 cents in 1873, and it is now 10 cents; from the Baltic Sea it was 9.7 cents in 1873, it is now 6 cents. From our Atlantic ports it was 21.1 cents in 1873, it is now 10.8 cents, and from the Pacific ports it was 26 cents in 1885. It will not be a year until the rate of freight from the Indian ports will be lower under the influence of England and the competition which she is building up than from this country. Shall we, shall the American Senate strike hands with Great Britain to drive the American wheat-grower out of the markets of the world?

It seems to me, Mr. President, striking down the competition in the West can have and will have no other effect; I can not for my life see how those gentlemen who represent the Atlantic seacoast can favor this proposition. We can not ship to New York and Baltimore and Philadelphia and Boston if we are to be denied the benefit of a low through rate. I see but one result if it is persisted in, and that is that a large part of Illinois and Nebraska and Iowa and Dakota and Wisconsin and Minnesota and Kansas will be compelled (and it will come as true as the sun comes in the morning if this policy is forced upon us)—will find its export market at Montreal, beyond the reach of such a jurisdiction, instead of as heretofore from New York and Baltimore and Boston and Philadelphia. And where our products are exported our merchants will be likely to buy. The Lake Superior system of commerce will take all this to Canada, and Canada will not be backward on her part.

Mr. President, section 4 of this bill, even if it were amended as the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] proposes, admits the principle for which I contend, and repudiates the proposition upon which the Senator from West Virginia bases his argument, to wit, that under no circumstances is it fair for a railway company to charge more for a short than for a long haul.

Reference is made to Massachusetts, from which section 4 is taken. In Massachusetts an attempt was made to incorporate into the law, for operation within the State only, this amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, but the Massachusetts general court, with great unanimity, voted it down. They were not willing to strike down competition in that State, as they saw and knew that such an amendment would do, and so they inserted in their law, and it has remained in their law, the very words which the Senator from West Virginia is so anxious to strike out—"from the same original point of departure."

Section 4 of the bill provides—

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction and from the same original point of departure.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], I think, would hardly have dared to face his constituents and report as chairman of this committee this section as I have thus far read it. I doubt if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] could have been induced to favor such a provision standing by itself. Let me complete the section. It is thus:

Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act such common carrier may in special cases be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property, and the commission may from time to time make general rules covering exceptions to any such common carrier in cases where there is competition by river, sea, canal, or lake, &c.

Here we have a recognition by the committee, after all the testimony it took, that there are, and will be, circumstances under which it would be injurious to the commerce of the country, and to the people, if the carrier is not permitted to charge more for a short haul than for a long haul.

Mr. CAMDEN. How is that provision affected by my amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. I understand that the pending amendment simply proposes to strike out from section 4 as it stands the words, "and from the same original point of departure."

Mr. CAMDEN. That is all.

Mr. SPOONER. Leaving the section to stand as I read it, with the provision in it that the Senator from West Virginia thinks ought not to be in it, that wherever there is competition by rail, by canal, by lake, by river the carrier shall be exempted from the operation of the provision in this section if the commissioners, or a majority of them, think the popular interest will be thereby subserved.

I do not think this proviso is adequate protection. If it be admitted, as the committee admits, as the bill admits, and as every one seems to admit but the Senator from West Virginia, that an absolute long and short haul provision would stifle competition, it seems that the Senate of the United States ought to hesitate a long while before it votes to turn these competitive forces—in which the people have so vital an interest, distributed all over the United States under every imaginable combination of circumstances, for which localities have taxed themselves millions of dollars—over to the discretionary power of a commission of five men.

I would not give the competitive benefits which we have in the country to-day and the interest of commerce over into the keeping of any board unless it was made up of angels. It is a dangerous experiment to try; and the Senator from West Virginia the other day made an argument against it which ought not to be forgotten, and I think he would not be content with it now if he did not regard the proviso authorizing exceptions to be made as an utterly nugatory provision. He said, and he said wisely, although perhaps I ought not to say it, that from the very beginning these commissioners, if they exercise the power given by the proviso, would be exercising it in favor of the railway companies and would be immediately brought under suspicion and their power for good would be impaired at the outset. Moreover, there would be so many complaints, with all the other matters of complaint which would come before the commissioners, that they would find it impossible, if they numbered one hundred instead of five, to consider the cases in which the interests of the people would absolutely demand that they should make exceptions.

I had the honor to give notice a few days ago that I would offer an amendment to this section, and I for one moment ask the attention of the Senate to this amendment. I do not know that it will meet the favor of a single Senator. I do not claim that it would accomplish what the Senator from West Virginia wants to accomplish; I do not think it would; but I do think it is the only safe provision which ought to be made in reference to this dangerous and difficult subject at this time. I have changed the language of section 4 around. Instead of making it a rule that no railroad company shall charge more for a short haul than a long haul, and giving to these commissioners the power, where they think it is best, to make exceptions, I have drawn a proposed section as follows:

It shall be lawful for said commissioners to prohibit, in special cases or by general rule, any common carrier within the provisions of this act from charging or receiving any greater compensation, in the aggregate, for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, and from the same original point of departure: Provided, however, That the power by this section given to said commissioners shall not be exercised so as to substantially deprive any place or community of the benefit and advantage of competition existing or hereafter to exist, it being the object hereof to provide in said commissioners a means of preventing, wherever the same can be done consistently with this proviso, any such carrier from recouping or making up by means of increased charges from local and non-competing stations for rates lowered elsewhere by reason of competition: Provided further, That the action taken by said commissioners under the provisions hereof shall be upon notice to the railway company or companies interested, and upon due hearing by said commissioners; and it shall be the especial duty of said commissioners to investigate and report at the next session of Congress as to the extent to which, if at all, the commercial interests of the country and justice to the carriers engaged in interstate commerce demand or permit the enactment of a law prohibiting carriers within the provisions of this act from charging or receiving any greater compensation, in the aggregate, for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance.

I should be willing, I think, to have this amended by striking out these words, "and from the same original point of departure," with the limitation contained in the proviso.

It has seemed to me that no Senator ought to be willing to vest in any commission a power over this subject, except with a declaration that they should not exercise it so as to substantially deprive any community of now existing competition. It is a limitation which I think the people will demand and the justice of which is apparent.

I am not surprised that the committee should, even after investigation, be unwilling to grapple with the question of pooling at this session, but should prefer to recommend delay until by more complete investigation more intelligent action can be had, but I confess to great surprise that the committee should at the same time consider it wise, without the most complete investigation possible, to arrest even in a qualified way the competitive forces of the country as provided by section 4. I think they could not have been criticised as too conservative in a matter of so great danger and delicacy and difficulty if they had left that, with the subject of pooling, to a future thorough investigation.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] because it is unfair to the railroads and it is unfair to the people. I do not suppose that I shall be accused of entertaining any particular regard for railroads as railroads, but only as servants of the people. I think that this amendment would discriminate against certain of our railroads in favor of others, against our railroads in favor of foreign corporations; and as an illustration will serve to give my idea better than any amount of logic, I will state a fact which does fully illustrate it.

Two or three years ago wheat was carried from Chicago (and Chicago has been the chief point that has been discussed here to-day, and it probably ships more freight than any point in the United States unless it is New York) to tide water at a rate of freight so low that it was put down to 10 cents a hundred on wheat. That was equivalent to $2 a ton from Chicago to New York. It was equivalent to 2 mills a ton per mile. What little I know of railroads leads me to believe that this freight, independent of other circumstances, could never have been transported for 2 mills per mile; but in the dull season of the year, when empty cars in the absence of that freight would be rolling back to tide water, the railroads could afford to take it and did take it. Why did they take it? Out from Chicago run numerous railroad lines.

There is the Pennsylvania Central, there is the Baltimore and Ohio, there is the Michigan Southern and Lake Shore, there is the Michigan Central, there is the Detroit and Milwaukee, which is now a part of the Grand Trunk, there is the connection the Grand Trunk has with its steamers from Chicago, and also the connection with the New York Central by steamer from Chicago.

Now suppose that the railroads had not taken that wheat at 10 cents a hundred from Chicago to New York, what would have been the result? It would have been taken by lake steamers, barges, or other craft down to Collingwood, at the foot of Georgian Bay, shipped on board the cars of the Grand Trunk road, taken to Montreal, and shipped to Europe, or it would have been taken down the lake to Point Edward, at the foot of Lake Huron, shipped aboard the Grand Trunk road there and taken to Montreal, or it would have gone in Canadian and American bottoms through to Montreal, and thus our railroads would have been discriminated against.

However, there is one point I did not mention. It could have gone by steamer to Buffalo, and there the New York Central would have been discriminated in favor of because the New York Central is wholly within the State of New York and is exempt from the provisions of this bill. That is a point which I think has not been mentioned. There is one of the largest corporations of this country that would have been discriminated in favor of. In regard to the point that my colleague from Michigan, for whose judgment I have the highest respect, made in relation to the control that this bill, if it becomes a law, would exercise over the shipping of the lakes, I think it would apply only to that shipping which is connected with some railroad or some canal-boat line and thus makes a continuous line in that way through to New York.

In carrying freights on the lakes nothing is ever said outside of these lines about rates to New York. It is 6 cents to Buffalo, 4 cents to Buffalo, 2 cents to Buffalo, and last year it was brought down to 2 cents a bushel on wheat to Buffalo. The railroads certainly were not there to divide it. They had no part or lot in it.

The rival lines of railroad brought lake freights down to this figure. They made money; they could afford to carry freight very low; otherwise they would have run to the tide water with empty cars.

Now my idea is this: We must not cripple the railroads; we must make them strong, and then make them behave themselves. There is the whole difficulty. We do not want to embarrass them; we want to control them.

As to the point which the Senator from Ohio made when he propounded a conundrum of this character, "If freight was being carried from Pittsburgh to New York at $20 a car, would it be equitable or just to take freight from Chicago to New York for $10 a car?" Abstractly we should say not. Independent of any qualifying conditions the answer involuntarily would be that it would not be equitable.

But when we take into consideration the competition that does exist at Chicago and the necessity for taking these freights at low rates, my opinion is that it would be better for Pittsburgh to permit that road to carry freights at any price it could make money at, particularly freight not naturally coming to it that she could not get without going into competition for it, and then let this commission come in and regulate the freights between Pittsburgh and New York.

In regard to the discrimination that my colleague alluded to, it is not the railroads that make the discrimination, it is the Almighty. Chicago is favorably situated. She has two strings and possibly five strings to her bow. She has the Lake, she has the Grand Trunk road, she has the British territory to go through, and she has these numerous railways of ours.

I think that if the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia should pass it would cover the bill with derision and there would be such a howl over this country before December that all of us who had voted for it would desire to hide our heads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 5, after the word "direction," it is proposed to strike out "and from the same original point of departure."

Mr. CAMDEN. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, the Chair is informed.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, in concluding the debate on this amendment, I shall not enter into any details or attempt to repeat the substance of the argument made by me some days ago in presenting it. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to the vital points embraced by the amendment. In the remarks which have been submitted in opposition to it, the attention of the Senate has been rather directed from the real question involved than to it. The argument of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] was one of confession and avoidance, rather than an argument against the proposition embraced in the amendment. The Senator, by his whole argument, admits the justice of the proposition, but contends that in other portions of the bill the remedy sought to be ingrafted by this amendment has been already provided for. If the bill as it stands provides for the remedy in the particulars affected by my amendment, why is it that Senators are so opposed to its adoption?

By the simple striking out of three or four words this section is rendered unambiguous, the plain meaning of the bill is brought out, and the commission itself has power to execute it without any question or doubt as to its meaning, and without reference to common-law principles, without reference to the right of individual shippers under any common-law interpretation of the bill.

This bill in all its provisions and in all its details is to be put in force by a commission, but the powers of the commission and the interpretation to be given by the commission to this act are limited in direct words on the long and short haul proposition. It recognizes the propriety of the long and short haul provision; it recognizes the equity of it; it recognizes its justice as between shippers; but while recognizing that there should be no "greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction," it then limits the application of the bill by adding "from the same original point of departure."

By limiting it to the same original point of departure the bill is made to discriminate against 80 per cent. at least, if not 90 per cent., of the shippers of this whole country, and against 90 per cent. of the territory of the United States. What equity and what reason can exist, if you recognize the principle at all for limiting it—what justice and equity can exist in applying it only to about 10 per cent. of the shippers and 10 per cent. of the territory of the United States?

Mr. President, there has been a great deal said against the effect this amendment would have on the shippers of the far West. It is not my desire, it is not the desire of any Senator who advocates this amendment, to impose any restrictions or burdens upon the shippers of the far West; and when you look at it it is remarkable in my mind that the advocates of the producers of the far West should in this Senate contend that because of their distance from the market they must have lower rates, in order to compete, than the nearer shippers living between the Mississippi and the seaboard. What reason is there in that? Is there any reason for changing by law the geographical conditions of this country? This bill simply does that. It changes the geography of the States in order to make the far shipper nearer to the market than the near shipper, and that the far shipper shall be charged less for taking his products to the market than the near shipper. That is the English of it; that is just what it means.

Mr. President, if the States of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia, and the Southern States are willing in their magnanimity to allow the shippers in the far West to get to market as cheap as these nearer States can, ought the latter to ask more? What condition of things can exist whereby the producers living west of the Mississippi River, so eloquently described by the Senator from Wisconsin, with so many competing lines of railway, should ask Congress to ingraft into this bill the condition that the railroads may give to those distant shippers a less rate of freight than is given to the nearer shippers and producers cultivating more expensive land and using fertilizers?

Senators lose sight of the fact that the markets of the world are open to competition from India and other grain-growing regions outside of the United States, and that the United States must come in competition with those products. They lose sight of the fact that actually more grain is grown between the Mississippi River and the Atlantic seaboard than is grown west of the Mississippi, and they levy a tax upon the greater portion of the product that goes to market for export in favor of the lesser proportion grown west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. President, the act of Massachusetts which embodies the same provision that is in this act as it stands including "the same original point of departure" has been referred to. The conditions are entirely different. In the State of Massachusetts, full of manufacturing towns, with only one seaport city, a State with a small amount of territory, it matters not in that State whether these words of limitation are in the bill or not. Competition there to all points produces the same effect without regard to the original point of departure; indeed there is really no analogy in the application of such a law between the State of Massachusetts with its great manufacturing towns and its great city of Boston as its exporting and importing point and the immense country lying between the Atlantic Ocean and the far West. The conditions do not exist there which make this limitation important one way or the other, but if we pass an act to prevent discriminations over the whole country it must be without limitation; if we do not, we entirely fail to meet the discrimination against 80 per cent. at least of the commerce of this country.

I would not ask that any conditions be imposed upon the railroads which would unduly restrict their business; I would not ask that any restriction be placed on any geographical section of the country that would operate unjustly and injuriously to that section; but if we are going to pass a law to prevent discrimination let us do it fairly and meet all the circumstances and all the geographical conditions and the interests of all the shippers.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I have not entered into the discussion of the bill, nor do I propose to do so; but I should like to ask him what we are to understand by discriminations. To illustrate, suppose a man has a thousand bushels of wheat in West Virginia costing the same price for producing it that the man who lives in Illinois has expended in raising a thousand bushels there. Both ship to New York. Does the Senator mean to say that the man in West Virginia pays more per bushel for shipping his grain to New York than the man in Illinois?

Mr. CAMDEN. I mean to say that the people of West Virginia and of Illinois in many portions of it pay more than people farther West.

Mr. LOGAN. The point is what the Senator means by "more." Does he mean on account of the distance, or does he mean that he pays more cents per bushel?

Mr. CAMDEN. I mean that he pays more cents per bushel, more in the aggregate, more per car-load.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not so understand it.

Mr. CAMDEN. It applies to West Virginia and it applies to Illinois outside of Chicago.

Mr. LOGAN. If that is so, I certainly do not understand the provisions of the bill. I do not understand it that way.

Mr. CAMDEN. If it does not have that effect, then my amendment will do no harm.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not understand it that way. I understood the proposition to be that if for instance this commission is appointed, and I reside 50 miles from Chicago and some other gentleman resides 200 miles farther off, and we both ship our grain into Chicago, though I claim that mine should be shipped for less than his, we ship at the same price, and the reason is that there is no advantage to be taken of the two producers. We get into Chicago at the same price and therefore our wheat is at the same profit; the mere question of distance does not affect that at all. It is the purpose to equalize the commerce where it is exchanged. Therefore the discrimination the Senator speaks of by reducing the freights on the wheat near Chicago and putting the rate up on the freight farther away from Chicago is not to exist. When you put it down at Chicago, if the advantage is to the man who is near, that is unfair. Is that what the Senator means?

Mr. CAMDEN. I mean just this, that by the bill itself a shipper 100 miles nearer the market can be charged twice as much as a shipper living 100 miles more distant from the market; and the object of my amendment is to see that the shipper who is 100 miles nearer to market shall not pay more in the aggregate than the shipper who is 100 miles farther distant from the market. That is the point of my amendment.

I will illustrate further to the Senator from Illinois. By this bill the rate per car is limited to the same point of departure. Therefore shippers at the same point of departure will have equal rights; but how is it after the shipment leaves the original point of departure? Take Chicago for instance. After it leaves Chicago and goes into the State 100 miles distant, the restriction is removed. After leaving Chicago the railroad can charge the shipper 100 miles east of Chicago twice the amount that it charges from Chicago. It can come into the State of Ohio and it can charge any shipper there twice the amount it charges from Chicago. It can in the State of West Virginia charge the shipper three times the amount it has charged from the original point of departure.

Mr. LOGAN. Do you mean under this bill?

Mr. CAMDEN. Under this bill. The amendment is simply to remedy that, and to strike out the words "and from the same original point of departure," and let the bill have general application all over the country.

Mr. BECK. I want to see if I understand this. Unless the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is adopted I understand that a car-load of wheat may go from Minneapolis to Chicago, and that a man living in Milwaukee, one-half way between Minneapolis and Chicago, on the same train may be charged twice as much.

Mr. CAMDEN. That is exactly it. That is what I seek to prevent. That is just the point that this amendment is intended to remedy. The State of New York has adopted the same principle, that the railroad companies shall not charge more for a shorter haul than for a longer haul, under the rules established by the commission of New York. It is the law regulating the railroads in France and in Belgium. As brought out in the testimony of Mr. Kernan, the rules adopted in France are—

1. No more charge for less than for a greater distance.

That is the rule of the government.

2. No discrimination between persons under similar circumstances.
3. No changes in rates except after specific public notice and upon approval of minister of public works.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question on that point. Perhaps the question has been put, but I have been absent from the Chamber. Is it not true that there are circumstances in which a railroad should be permitted to make a larger charge for a short haul than for a long one; as, for instance, suppose the intermediate point in the line be a point to which there is no returning full freight, so that all the cars that go one way do not go back full, but go back empty, or the small quantity of matter to be handled requires an increased cost for handling at the station, and all those things which are familiar to every railroad man; or take the case which has been discussed here so often, where to the more distant point there is a competition with a water way, where a railroad in order to take the freight must take it at actual cost or even at a loss, if you consider that point alone? Now if it be true that there are cases to be conceded, cases frequently existing in railroad management, where that should be permitted, then you ought not to have an absolute provision in the bill which prevents it in all cases; but unless it comes within some of those cases which I have supposed, why does not the provision of the bill which authorizes the putting a stop to all unreasonable discrimination come in and cure the difficulty?

Mr. CAMDEN. I answer in the first place that you have not a full remedy here. There are theories on this subject and there are instances in which railroad experts claim that this should be permitted, but I say that those instances can not be sustained. It involves the principle that you can haul a loaded car cheaper than you can haul an empty one. It involves the principle that you can haul a loaded car a greater distance for less money than you can haul it a short distance. Those things do not exist. You may claim that a railroad can haul a car a greater distance for the same money, but no condition of things exists under which you can say that a railroad can haul a car a greater distance for less than nothing, and it involves that very principle. You must say that a railroad can haul a loaded car for less than nothing——

Mr. HOAR. Take this simple case——

Mr. CAMDEN. I have not answered the Senator yet.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. CAMDEN. The second proposition the Senator made, if I remember correctly, was that if the conditions exist in any case discretion should be left to the commissioners to remedy it. This amendment does not take away from the commissioners the discretion to remedy these hardships if any are found to exist. That is left in the bill.

The amendment goes no further than to prevent discrimination against 80 per cent. of the shippers and the producers and the farmers of this country. By the terms of this bill it is applicable to only a few competitive points, and is in the interest of a few competitive points; it is in the interest of the large shippers and it is against the interest of the great bulk of the commerce of the people and of the towns of this country, and it can not be supported by any fair argument of justice or equity. In my judgment there can be no reason given for it except the reason to legislate in favor of the cities and the large competitive shipping points, to build them up and to depopulate the towns and the distribution of manufactories throughout the country.

Look at the operation of this. Take Saint Louis as a point and come into Indiana where there is no competition. You may go 50 miles from Saint Louis and a manufactory could not exist there, because it could not ship its products a shorter distance for the same amount that a shipment could be made for a longer distance from Saint Louis. A manufacturer under certain circumstances might have advantages to build up a manufacturing interest at a local point, yet by reason of the very fact that the competitive point is Saint Louis, and that freight can be shipped at a cheaper rate by competitors in the same business, that manufactory is destroyed. That is one instance.

You may go through Indiana and that same principle is involved all the time. You may go into Ohio, you may go to West Virginia, and the same result follows. Towns can not be built up between intermediate competitive points. If you offer to ship you have to pay more for the less distance; labor must go away from the country to the cities, and the farmers themselves are placed at a disadvantage as against those at the points that are called competitive points.

This principle of the long and short haul is recognized in New York by the railroad commission of the State. It is recognized by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. There is not a well-managed railroad in this country, in my judgment, that objects to it. It simply has the effect of equalizing rates over the whole country and to give the people and the towns and the shippers of the whole country an equal chance.

Senators can not as a matter of justice or policy urge any good reason for denying this amendment. If this amendment is defeated you ingraft it here on the statute-book and make it stand out in bold relief that this Senate is legislating against the interests of the community at large in favor of large competitive shipping points. We do not ask to do any injustice to the large shipping points by this amendment. I want to see cities grow, but they ought not to grow at the expense of the country at large.

Take the raising of wheat in Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, West Virginia, and in Kentucky; we do not ask to get to market cheaper than those farther west. We say to them, "You are entitled to all the advantages you have; we do not ask a reduction to your disadvantage; we only ask that you shall not have a lower rate than we have in the aggregate." In other words, we ask that you shall not ship wheat or live stock by our doors to the same market, twice the distance, at a less price per carload than we get, thereby reducing the value of our product in the market as compared with your product in the market to the extent that you have a lower rate than we have.

Is there any reason that can be given why this principle should not be of general application? As long as the fourth section of the bill limiting it to the same point of departure stands as it is the bill legalizes discrimination and authorizes the commission, when appointed, to carry it out. And the commission can not do otherwise than carry it out, because it has no power to make rules varying it. If you leave in this bill the words "and from the same original point of departure," the commission can not go beyond that, and when a shipper comes here from an intermediate point and complains of discrimination and asks the commission for a remedy, the reply of the commission will be "There is the law; it recognizes the right to charge you more than the shipper from a more distant point, and we have no power to interfere. We can not change it. We are only appointed to carry out the provisions of the law and we can not go beyond it."

Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the question further. I have presented the points which I think ought to be considered, and I do not believe it is possible to pass a law permitting discriminations recognized by this bill as it stands. It would mean to apply the principle to a few competitive points and to leave outside at least 80 per cent. of all the people, and all the towns, and all the manufacturing interests of the country. The Senate can not afford to do that. It is the worst kind of discrimination, and in my judgment no bill can give satisfaction, and can reach the points of discrimination complained of in the long and short hauls, that contains the words "and from the same original point of departure."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER obtained the floor.

INVITATION TO ANTIETAM BATTLEFIELD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair takes this opportunity to present a communication from the chairman of the First Army Corps Association.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 3, 1886.

SIR: On behalf of the committee of the First Army Corps Association, I have the honor to extend to you, and through you to the members of the honorable body over which you preside, a cordial invitation to join with the association in a visit to the historic battlefields of Antietam and South Mountain, in Maryland, on the 14th and 15th May instant.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully,

EDWARD S. BRAGG, Chairman.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President United States Senate.

FORT SELDEN MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, a bill has to-day been received by the Senate from the House of Representatives, granting the right of way through the Fort Selden military reservation, in New Mexico, to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company, a bill which has passed the Senate twice heretofore and is now on the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent to take up the House bill for passage. It will take but a moment, and it is important it should pass at an early day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). If the Senator will indulge the Chair a moment the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives. The Chair will first lay before the Senate the bill (H. R. 661) granting the right of way through the Fort Selden military reservation, in New Mexico, to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company.

The bill was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the Senate proceed to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just read.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state that the railroad was built years ago through this reservation by the permission of the Secretary of War. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] is familiar with the case. I think he reported a couple of times to the Senate a bill for this purpose which has passed the Senate twice.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which grants the right of way to the extent of 100 feet, and no more, in width through the Fort Selden military reservation, New Mexico, to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senate bill on the same subject, the bill (S. 189) granting the right of way through the Fort Selden military reservation, New Mexico, to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company, will be indefinitely postponed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 1341) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Natchez, Miss.;

A bill (H. R. 3440) making an appropriation to construct a macadamized road from the United States barracks in Saint Bernard Parish, Louisiana, to the national military cemetery at Chalmette, in said parish;

A bill (H. R. 5401) making appropriations for additional barracks at the Southern, Northwestern, and Western branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers;

A bill (H. R. 7183) to authorize the purchase of a certain tract of land near San Antonio, Tex.; and

A bill (H. R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of "general-service clerks" and "general-service messengers" in the Army.

The bill (H. R. 606) authorizing the removal of the statue of Maj. Gen. John A. Rawlins from its present location to a site to be selected by the Secretary of War, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

The bill (H. R. 985) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at said place for educational purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 112) for the relief of the estate of the late James G. Wintersmith, late Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

STATUE OF GENERAL RAWLINS.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to have the bill authorizing the Secretary of War to remove the statue of General Rawlins taken up and passed. I am sure there will be no objection to it. It appropriates $500, and gives the Secretary of War authority to select the site where it shall be placed.

Mr. CULLOM. I must insist on the regular order from this out. I have yielded two or three times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator's colleague.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought he was through with his request.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I merely asked to have the House bill put on its passage to remove the statue of General Rawlins.

Mr. CULLOM. I will yield for that.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (H. R. 606) authorizing the removal of the statue of Maj. Gen. John A. Rawlins from its present location to a site to be selected by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order referring the bill to the Committee on the Library will be reconsidered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS RELATIVE TO CHINESE.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Commitee on Foreign Relations, reported the following order:

Ordered, That Senate bill 1991, entitled a bill supplementary to and amendatory of "an act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, &c., reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and Senate bill 2225 to indemnify certain subjects of the Chinese Empire for losses sustained by violence of a mob at Rock Springs, &c., be, and hereby are, made special orders for Monday, the 10th day of May at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senate will consent to that arrangement. The committee desire to bring those subjects up together, and they are both very important and pressing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the order.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senate will make that conditional that the interstate-commerce bill be out of the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so framed that it does not interfere with any unfinished business.

Mr. HARRIS. The unfinished business would take precedence of a special order.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose it is ungracious perhaps to suggest even that there should be any consideration when a committee asks for a special order; but the truth is this, I think, that we had perhaps ten days ago several matters clashing for precedence here and by a kind of universal consent an order was arranged for those matters. Some of them are special orders and some are not. The passage of this resolution, as I understand, would displace some matters which it is understood shall go along in regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow the Chair to interrupt him? A single objection will carry the resolution over until to-morrow.

Mr. PLATT. I do not make an objection, but I can think of some things, like the arbitration bill, which has not been made a special order as I understand, like the pension bill, which has not been made a special order as I understand, that ought to be considered; and if this is made a special order it takes precedence of those two measures which I think of now, which I suppose it was understood by general consent were to follow the interstate-commerce bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be objection the motion lies over under the rule.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object, but I would like to enter a motion at the same time to go with this, and ask the indulgence of the Senate one moment to state what it is. The bill for newly arranging the debts of the several Pacific railroads is a bill of vast importance. It was introduced at the last session of the Senate, and, being of so much importance, it was not only very thoroughly considered by the Judiciary Committee, but it was submitted by myself, who had it in charge, to various members of the Senate, including yourself, sir——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Asking their special consideration, as you will remember, of the provisions of that bill. It has been considered in the interval in the Interior Department, and it was reported among the very first measures of this session; it was on the Calendar within two or three weeks after the beginning of the session. I desire to enter a motion to make that bill a special order after this. The Chair will permit that motion to be made and to go over with this.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I must decline to yield any longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to ask what order has been made, if any?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. None at all.

Mr. HOAR. This is to be called up to-morrow, and I want my motion to go with it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will yield simply to pass an order.

Mr. HOAR. I merely ask that my motion may be entered now, in order that it may be in order to-morrow to come up with this order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CAMDEN, in section 4, line 5, after the word "direction," to strike out the words "and from the same original point of departure."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I do not propose to ask of the Senate more indulgence than is necessary (which I know they will be willing to grant) to explain the reasons for the vote which as a Senator I shall cast on the pending bill. In its importance to the people this bill transcends, perhaps, most of those we have had under consideration this session.

Similar measures have been pending in the two Houses of Congress for the last six or eight years at least, and probably much longer. There is no measure before this Senate, and possibly none before the House of Representatives, which attracts more attention from the general public than this one to regulate interstate commerce.

I may be permitted to say here, too, that much of the discussion that has ensued upon this bill has not been of the kind that we had a right to expect from Senators. Too many stump speeches have been ingrafted into it. It is this which makes it quite proper for a Senator who proposes to vote upon it to give a why and wherefore.

Now, sir, if we leave in this bill those few words, "and from the same original point of departure," we do more, as the Senator from West Virginia has said, than legalize discrimination; we come in here at this time to approve and indorse the railroad jobbery and railroad robbery generally for the last fifty years, and particularly for the last twenty-five years. It is legalizing the very evil from which the people of this country have suffered at the hands of the railroad corporations.

Who is here to assert that shipments from terminal points are not carried frequently at losing rates? Who is here to assert that the intermediate shipper does not only have to pay a profit upon what he ships, but must make up the losses that accrue from reduced rates from terminal to terminal, and make up also the profits that ought to have accrued to the railroad company from those shipments?

This question has been argued here as if there were but two terminal points in the United States, the one being Chicago with her lakes, and the other New York. I can account for it to my own satisfaction very well. This might as well have been entitled a bill to coerce all shippers into sending their products to New York Harbor. There are other cities in this country; there are other harbors in this country; there are other towns in this country, and those who want to transport their products from one terminal point to another under this bill should know that there are more people living between these terminal points than there are at the termini which they propose to accommodate.

I want to illustrate the effects of this bill upon the State that I in part represent here. There are four lines of railroad, grand trunk lines of railroad, traversing three or four, and one of them five, States, passing through the State of Virginia. A man who does not know that this bill says they may ship from the terminal points south of us and can not discriminate between any freight that is shipped from that same point, and at the same time will not admit that this bill says that they may discriminate as against all freight shipped from any intermediate point, either is in ignorance of the bill, the terms of the bill, the spirit and the intention of it, or else he is representing a remote terminal and wants to transport his own products to the commercial centers of this country at cut rates.

If it had been the intention of the framers of this bill to deceive the Senate, they would not have put these seven words in it. Therefore, I must accord that they were honest to a degree, for they put in words that no man can misunderstand. You may ship from any point south of Virginia—a terminal point—you may land your cotton or other produce at a seaport as good as that of which New York boasts, and better, at any rate of freight that the railroads may fix from that point. You come to Lynchburg on one line of road, and they may fix even a higher rate from Lynchburg to Newport News or to Norfolk than that fixed upon that which started from the "original point of departure" south of Lynchburg.

You may take another line of railroad that passes through Virginia and North Carolina and on south, and ship from there, and the same discrimination may be made against Danville, Richmond, and any other intermediate point on that line of road. You may start from Kentucky over the Chesapeake and Ohio, and bring freight across the West Virginia line and land it at Staunton, and there charge from Staunton on down to deep water a higher rate on freight loaded there than that which the railroad company fixed upon the freight which was shipped from the "original point of departure" in Kentucky. If this be not true, then I ask any Senator on this floor to explain what these seven words mean?

I repeat, it is the greatest evil from which we have been suffering at the hands of corporations. It is legalizing in the great hereafter these discriminations against the producing people who live outside of a few cities where non-producing commission merchants thrive and elevators make a profit. It is discriminating against everybody who lives between terminal points or "original points of departure."

Why, sir, I will take the valley of Virginia and go on through to the Tennessee line, and I can demonstrate, or illustrate rather, just exactly what the President of this body said when he spoke to this same question the other day. There they charge the producing people along that line of road more per hundred, more per car, for what they carry even here into the city of Washington than they charge for the same carriage of freight over the same line of railroad under the same management from points three, four, five, six hundred miles west of the Ohio River. This bill says they shall have a right to do it, gives them the legal right to do it. The people who have been clamoring for legislative protection against this outrage and wrong are met here with a bill that contains seven words which say they may go on and do what they have done, and we will legalize it for all time to come.

That is this bill. What is the object of it? Is it to bring the States removed from here thousands of miles nearer to deep water, to the commercial centers, than those that are geographically located right around them? Is not that the object? Would you take one of the States or all the States that fed the millions of people of this country before the new ones were developed till their soil has been exhausted to a point where scarcely any profit comes from its cultivation, and bring these in competition with those of the older States that fed you when you were babies, and put the latter where they can not get to market with what they produce? That is what these seven words would do. They would simply say that any product from west of the Ohio or Mississippi Rivers should be put into market at a lower rate of freight than any product that might be grown in a State that is a thousand miles nearer the market. That can only be sustained on one ground, that there shall be no legislation here save and except in the interest of New York Harbor and the people of a few cities who live three thousand or more miles from it.

But, Mr. President, there is one section of this bill—if I may call it a section, for I believe the sections are not numbered, but it is on page 6, beginning at line 33—that has a peculiar significance just now, in view of the frequent allusions to the law of Massachusetts. I hear it is section 5. That section changes the common law and the statute law of nearly every State in this Union, fixing the liability of common carriers of freight. Are you ready for that? Gentlemen should sympathize largely with their own constituents. Here you take away from the States the little security they have provided for themselves. I never saw anything more adroitly drawn than that section, and I never would have noticed it but for the fact that an eminent Senator here, my colleague, called my attention to it not over half an hour ago. Here it is set forth in terms that where there are joint tariff contract rates they may be published, or must be published, by the different corporations entering into those contracts. There is no provision for lines connecting where this joint tariff contract is not entered into. Suppose, then, you start on a railroad at one point and you encounter another, and then another, before you reach the harbor at which you want to unload your freight. What control have you over that middle line of railroad which you make no provision for in this section? It is free from all binding obligations under this that you call a law regulating interstate commerce. If there were three lines of railroad from Memphis to Norfolk, and you were to start a car-load of cotton from Memphis and land it upon this middle line and then again upon another, and there were no contracts between them, who is to say that either the middle line or that which had its terminus at Norfolk can not charge what it shall please?

Then comes the joint contract arranged between the railroad organizations of which the country shall know nothing and the commission shall be as ignorant of. I have heard it said not only on this floor but in general talk that the railroad men of this body want this bill to pass as it is. I am not surprised to hear it. If there be a railroad man here I say that I do not know it, and when I make the statement I only do it because I have heard these things said off this floor as arguments to influence votes—if there be a railroad man here, or a representative of railroad interests, one who so far forgets the representative duties of one who represents a constituency and not a railroad—ask him if he wants to vote against the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia? I would be willing to risk the issue on that if Senators who have made these declarations and who have talked about the question would just take their position on the amendment.

I said that this changed the common law and the statute law of the States. I should not expect an answer from either of the Senators from Massachusetts were I to put what I am going to say in interrogative form. I say that section 5 substantially repeals the statute of Massachusetts regulating the responsibilities of railroad carriers practically and effectually. For what this Congress proposes to do now it proposes to do in the exercise of a constitutional right, which is to override the rights of the States in the control and management of the corporations that do business across their territory.

Then there is a law, common as well as statute, which makes common carriers the insurers of freight and of passengers only where there is a wrongful act, neglect or default, on the part of the company or some of its employés. You can hold them responsible for injuries done not only to a man, but to a beast or to the products of the earth; they are held prima facie liable, and no testimony is taken in a court to prove more than that the property was destroyed, excepting the act of God and the public enemy. This bill gives corporations an opportunity to ignore that law entirely. I do not claim to be as old a practitioner as some of the Senators here, but I am not afraid to lay down the proposition that this section 5 does effectually what I say, and if you leave in these words you will have the support of every railroad president and railroad director in the United States.

Mr. President, I listened to the argument of the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], that there is a remedy for all these things in the first section. He pleads here all the time in confession and avoidance. He confesses the possibility of wrongs being committed under this bill, wrongs and outrages perpetrated under it, if it were not for this first section, which provides for a commission to pass upon all cases of extortion—five commissioners, three of whom would be a majority. I could take the whole five if it were necessary for my purposes, but it is only necessary to take three; I can select three railroad magnates in this country who would take three of those commissioners and hang them on their watch-chains and display them for charms around the country.

When Senators fail to see, or refuse to see, the meaning of seven words in a bill of twenty-one pages, because they have a peculiar constituent interest to represent, and that being in antagonism to the interests of the people of the whole country, how can you expect much from five railroad commissioners whose pockets will be filled with passes and who will have permission to run over the roads and examine into the question of extortion? How long would they stop over here in Alexandria to determine whether there had been any discrimination between Atlanta and Washington, Atlanta being, as we suppose, an original point of departure? How long would your five commissioners stop at any point in Maryland to investigate whether there was any discrimination against that particular point on freight going to New York compared with that which was shipped from some extreme western starting station and called an original point of departure?

Your commissioners would know nothing but what they heard in the large cities. They would inquire for nothing else, and when men do not ask for information they never get it. The other side would possibly give them a little more than they would ask for, but they would always propound something in their own interest.

Mr. President, I started in simply to give the reasons why I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. I think I have made myself understood on it, and I may hereafter give a reason why I shall not vote, why I can not vote for the bill with these seven words in it. I can not stand here and vote for a half dozen cities of this country, and ignore entirely all the people who work to produce, and who ask for nothing more than that they shall not be charged a higher rate of freight for a short haul than for a long one.

If this bill proposed to prorate I should hesitate, because I do not want to break down the railroad system of the country; but a bill which simply says that they shall not charge more for 100 miles than they do for a thousand I can vote for, and if the railroads be under honest management they can need no legislation and no laws to prohibit them from going beyond such an inhibition.

I say now, Mr. President, again, that my only purpose was to have it understood that I believe exactly what you said on this floor, that this bill as it stands legalizes discrimination against nine-tenths of the people of this country. I believe it is just such a bill as the railroads want. I believe it is just such a bill as the people of this country do not want, and that within twelve months after its enactment, if it should ever become a law, there are Senators on this floor who would possibly be reminded of what the late Stephen A. Douglas once said, that he traveled from New York to Chicago by the light of his own effigy.

It will take but a short time for the people to understand it. You may call it something to regulate interstate commerce. The title is high-sounding and in splendid phraseology. It is suggestive to the people, but when they see the effect of it then they will begin to wonder who wrote the title and inquire who voted for the bill.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this bill is the first step in the direction of restraint by law on the transportation system of the country. Competition has entirely failed to produce the end of reasonable and just rates between the various parts of the country, and I suppose there is no more universal demand, and never has been upon any subject, than that there shall be some regulation by law of the action of corporations in this direction. So far as I am concerned, and I believe the people generally, it is not in a spirit of hostility or want of appreciation of the necessities of these great instrumentalities of modern times, nor with any desire to take away from them a reasonable and even a liberal compensation for the services which they render and for the capital which is invested in them and for the labor which they employ, but they have become a power in the State, a power greater perhaps than that of the Government itself, their revenues aggregating far more than the revenues of the country with its great taxing power, and in many instances it has been exerted to the destruction of the interests of the different States and parts of States and of the business pursuits and the value of real estate.

The question which is raised by the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is one that deserves the most careful consideration. I find in the report of the Committee on Interstate Commerce some very valuable facts. I find in the testimony of Mr. Norris in regard to the effect of pooling arrangements a very remarkable statement. Said that gentleman:

If you will permit, I desire to refer to one point which I have in mind in connection with Mr. Blanchard's statement the other day before your committee, that the farm lands in New York had increased from $50 to $300 an acre in some places, I think, and that as the result of the pooling arrangement the territory between Chicago and Omaha, which is subject to a very arbitrary pool, had grown enormously. I simply want to suggest the probability of this growth of territory between Chicago and Omaha being due not to the compactness of the pools but to the low charges for carrying grain from Chicago to the seaboard, while other sections east of Chicago, and especially east of the trunk line terminally are forced to pay successive charges, thus placing the Chicago shipper nearer tide than the Pennsylvania farmer is. Coupled with the cheapness of the land, this would account for the emigration of our labor to that territory.

In the State of Pennsylvania in 1880, the farm lands as returned by the census report for that year had depreciated about 25 per cent. from the value per acre for 1870.

Senator MILLER. May not some or all of that be due to the fact that in 1870 gold was at a premium and in 1880 it was at par?

Mr. NORRIS. That would probably account for a greater part if it were not so that in the State of Pennsylvania, in 1870, the proportion of the farmers to the whole workers was one-fourth, so that each farmer had three other workers' families to provide for, while in 1880 the farmer had four other families to provide for, the non-agricultural population having increased from 75 per cent., in 1870, to 80 per cent., in 1880. Another evidence of that is the fact that taking the gold measure the agricultural production of the State of Pennsylvania in 1880 was $22,000,000 less on a gold basis than in 1870; that is, assuming that in 1870 gold was at a premium of 25 per cent. and in 1880 it was at par. There is hardly a State in the Union which is better adapted for agricultural development than the State of Pennsylvania. It has been so cited in the reports of the Department of Agriculture, and for the reason of the large non-agricultural population which provided a home market for all of the domestic production.

The figures of our State board of agriculture indicate that in the single item of wheat, the State of Pennsylvania consumes 4,500,000 bushels of wheat more than it produces, and yet our production of wheat is falling off, although our acreage of improved land has increased, and while I will concede that to the non-agricultural population cheap bread in so far as it reduces the cost of living is a public benefaction, yet in the State of Pennsylvania that does not amount to more than five hundred and odd thousand dollars a year. I figure it up, on the statements which the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the State board of agriculture had prepared, that in the item of grain we were saved $522,000 a year, while to reimburse the railroad companies for their low charges on Western products which are sent to Europe we pay in the East, not Pennsylvania merely, but in the Eastern States, about $17,000,000 a year, which is levied upon the local traffic to reimburse the railroad companies for losses on through traffic; and the tax which the Pennsylvania Railroad Company imposes on us according to my computation is $4,800,000.

That illustrates very conclusively the effect upon the country of the railroad system and of the system of a higher price for a shorter distance than a longer one. Under the operation of the competition which has rendered that necessary, Pennsylvania has been discriminated against and the value of lands depreciated, the agricultural production diminished, and the agricultural population transferred farther west to the point of arbitrary competition. If that be the effect of any system it is a great power, a power which extends to the destruction of commercial values and to the arbitrary destruction of all the agricultural and commercial interests of a community.

How shall it be remedied? The bill declares, first, that there shall be no unjust charges; that is to say, no extravagant or unreasonable charges. It then provides that there shall be no discrimination in respect to persons as to charges, no advantages to one over another, and no discrimination in reference to opportunities, no preference of one person over another.

It then establishes as the principle and the means by which these ends shall be attained that there shall be no higher charge for a shorter distance than a longer one from the point of departure. It therefore assumes the power to regulate the charges. It declares that Congress has power to say how much a road shall charge for one distance or another.

This covers the whole subject, but the manner in which it does it is by providing that the system complained of in the testimony of Mr. Norris shall take effect, and that there shall be selected a point of competition, a point of departure, and that from that point, wherever it may be, all charges shall be subject to this rule that no more shall be charged for the shorter distance than for the longer one, no matter how much longer; it may be a thousand miles and the other may be but 1 mile.

Now, the Senator from West Virginia proposes to make that universal, and he proposes to say that it shall not be from the point of original departure, but that everywhere there shall be a principle that there shall be no more charged upon that line for a shorter distance than for a longer one, but that you may charge as much. This does not reach the evil; it is perhaps not in the direction of reaching it. It does, however, destroy the proposition that there shall be one favored point of original departure, and that upon that line this principle shall apply everywhere. Certainly it does not injure the people who live at the intermediate points that outside of their business there shall accrue to that road a revenue from some other source; it does not injure them that a line of road whatever may be the charges to them shall derive a revenue, an income from other sources of business than those which the local trade supplies. On the contrary, it reduces the aggregate expenses and enables the transporting line to do the local business at cheaper rates. There is no question about that.

But then it has been found that whatever may be the advantage in that respect the result did not happen that when in the power of the corporation its interest led it to exact from the local business the utmost charge that it would bear, and it is for the restraint of power that this law is intended. If corporations always did exactly that which was best for the people, leaving to themselves a reasonable profit, there would be no necessity for any law regulating interstate commerce.

The proposition made by the Senator from Wisconsin that this is depriving the extreme West or the extreme South, or any other point where there is competition of natural advantages, is untenable, for the reason that within the line of a longer and a shorter distance the margin is so great that you touch the point where there is no compensation at all to a railroad company. If they can not make a profit by applying the principle that you shall not charge more for a shorter than a longer distance they can not make a profit at all; they reach a point where no business can be done except at a loss, and when doing business at a loss of course there is no ground or possibility of competition with others.

Then, again, this is not a natural advantage; it is an arbitrary and an artificial one. If you apply the principle of allowing natural advantages you will establish a pro rata amount according to the distance anywhere along the line, and that would give to the points of greatest contiguity or proximity the natural advantage of shorter distance and of the smaller expense which those elements would demand.

Therefore it is not a question which can be regulated by natural advantages; it is a question which must be regulated upon other elements altogether, which are not contained in this bill. While I shall support the bill and commend it as a step in the direction which legislation must assume, that of regulating upon a reasonable basis in the interests of the railroad corporations themselves and of the people by allowing to them a reasonable compensation upon the necessary, the proper economical cost of construction of their property, upon the principle of strictly regulating the compensation to be derived from the business of their road by measuring it by this standard; while it is a step in that direction, acknowledging the power of Congress in respect to interstate commerce to regulate the rates of transportation, it fails, I think, in recognizing the principle that upon every railroad line, differing as they do in their connection, in the amount of their business, in the capacities of transportation which they may have, and in the costs of construction and operating expenses, the only just and compensating rate to all interests is to be ascertained by considerations based upon the amount of business and the cost of operation and construction. How far this is practicable, and by what means it may be effected, is the great question which is forced upon our consideration by the public necessities.

It should be allowed to the road to do all the business it can, whether it be from a distance or from its local business. However, the only just and equitable rate to be imposed upon that business is one which is measured by the revenues and by the gross and net earnings of the company as measured by its proper cost, leaving out of view that great evil which more than everything else places now one million of unemployed people upon this country, which more than anything else causes the terrible troubles of labor and the dissatisfaction between the laboring men and the employer, this fictitious stock, this watered bonded indebtedness, this unnatural value which has been placed on the railroads of the country in the shape of public securities to be paid by taxes upon the labor of the country in the shape of improper costs of transportation, of unnecessary and extravagant charges. It is very clear that the power of imposing a tax or charge on the production and business of a great country such as ours granted to railroad corporations is a franchise which may be made as oppressive and ruinous to the people as the most severe exercise of the power of taxation by the Government.

It is quite obvious to me that this is a step in the right direction, but it is only a step. It is quite clear that in the bill it is provided that no charge shall be unreasonable or unjust which is within the limit, that it shall not be greater for a shorter than it is for a longer distance. That is the standard provided in the bill, and the section which provides that charges shall be just and reasonable is in reference to this standard. That is what the bill says is just and equitable, that the charge shall not be greater for a shorter than for a longer distance. That is the measure of justice and equity, but yet, as I said, it is quite manifest to me from reading the provision here that this system of fixing a point of departure and requiring that there shall be no greater charge for a longer distance from that point, as is stated by Mr. Norris, is just the one that may work and will work to the injury of all intermediate points. It is a discrimination in favor of the point of departure; it is a fixing of a lower rate for that point than for any other; it leaves the intermediate route as was done in this case entirely within the control of the corporation. If we shall endeavor to equalize all parts of the country in respect to cost of transportation we shall find it an impossible task. We should find that other inequalities existed in respect of climate, soil, habits of labor, and other causes. Yet it remains true that in respect of transportation it is not right that intermediate communities should be made to pay the cost of transporting the productions of the terminal points at prices which enable them to undersell their own products.

For these reasons I shall support the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 5, after the word "direction," it is proposed to strike out the words "and from the same original point of departure."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I paired yesterday with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who was compelled to be absent to-day. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I should vote "yea" if I were not paired. I leave it to his colleague to say how he would vote.

Mr. PLATT. I think my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I shall not vote, but simply announce that I should vote "yea" if I were not paired.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] who is absent. I understand that the pair has been transferred, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Nevada].

Mr. HEARST (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. STANFORD].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] was called away from the Chamber for a short time and I am paired with him. As I do not know how he would vote on this question I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON. I am paired on this question with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague [Mr. WALTHALL] is paired on this question with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."
